The Britts, who have visited Salem before, and who since here have motored to the beaches and other adjacent resorts, leave today for their respective homes via the Denver and Rio Grande route.

While in Salem Mr. Britt has given highly interesting glimpses of the mining business—its geological aspects; the fascination from scientific as well as personal standpoint of discovering new ore veins; their subsequent development; the distribution and marketing of mine products; and the sociological and other conditions connected with mining life. He also has told of some of its illusions—many expecting to find a fortune over night, with no effort upon their part.

Among those met in the mining business, from the cosmopolitan to the digger, Mr. Britt finds much of human interest, including the contacts, the fellowship and the fraternity between people who live the broad life in the open. He also said that they make mining a fascinating as well as a profitable business.

Mr. Britt is an expert in the line and a typical example of the practical, progressive, conservative mining man operating in this branch of the country's resources. After a brief sojourn at the Royal Gorge, Mr. Britt will return to his home in Daguerre, California, and his mother, Mrs. William Britt, and sister, Helen Britt, will return to Merrill, Wisconsin.
