BODY OF MISSING AIR MAIL PILOT IS DISCOVERED

Bellefonte, Pa., Oct. 12—The frantic search for Charles Ames, air pilot who disappeared 10 days ago, ended Sunday on Nittany mountain, six miles northeast of Bellefonte, when the body of the birdman was found in his wrecked plane, which had crashed against the side of the mighty hill.

A party of searchers, one of the thousands who tramped the hills and valleys since Ames was reported lost, came upon the wreckage late in the morning. Ames' body, bearing only a few bruises, was found in the cockpit of the ship. The body, lifted from the cockpit, was brought to Bellefonte and taken to an undertaking establishment.

Death Instantaneous, Belief That Ames met instant death was the belief of the air-mail officials. His face was badly bruised, but the body contained few other marks. The point where Ames crashed is densely wooded. It was evident that the pilot, flying low, crashed into the four trees, the plane tumbling to a stop against the trunk of a fifth. The trees closing in upon the wreckage, making it impossible for the airman who have searched this entire region to locate the spot where Ames met death.

Ames was on his course and was near the Holola light, beacon for airmen, when he met his fate. Over the point where his body rested in the debris airman have passed each day, flying east and west with their cargoes of mail for New York and Chicago. Shipment of Mail Late. The shipment of mail in Ames' plane was intact, and shortly after it was removed from the wreckage it was on its way west in a plane piloted by F. R. Hill. Nature conspired to keep the fate of the birdman unknown, for when the wrecked ship of the air was found it was discovered that four kings of the forest, broken off when the plane crashed into them, had formed a perfect cover. Under these four big trees, completely shrouded, rested the wreckage containing the pilot's body.
