A lecture on the development of water power on the Clackamas river was given before the Salem Lions club this noon by O. B. Coldwell, vice president of the Portland Electric Power company. The lecture was accompanied by a series of stereopticon slides, and dealt with the construction of the 35,000 horse power plant built recently by the P. E. P. company on the Clackamas river. Before beginning the main part of his lecture Mr. Coldwell stopped to dispute popular beliefs, such as the idea that "money will come rolling into this state simultaneously with the development of water power. There's nothing to it," said Coldwell. "Cheap power will not bring industries here, and high priced power will not keep them out. Only about 2.3 per cent of the total cost of factory production is ordinarily spent for power."

Frank Allen, Dale Arthur and C. N. Willie, convicts at the prison who said they witnessed the escape from a window of the cell house, were called by the defense. Their story of the break was practically the same as that told by other witnesses except they said that the first shots were fired by the guards and not by the escaping convicts.

Fallen and Arthur contradicted the testimony of Warden Dalrymple, who said that after running to his house for a gun he got behind some oil barrels near the garage and fired three shots at the fleeing convicts just after they came over the wall at tower one. Both said that they saw the warden come out of his house with the gun, but declared that at that time the three fugitives were half way across the field between the asylum and the prison, out of gunshot range and that the warden did not fire.

C. M. Charlton, former principal keeper at the prison, testified that he had placed Wilton in the bull pen at the latter's own request.
