Better Health - Longer Life

Preparation For Inevitable Heart Disease Made By Combination of Infection and Overstrain
By LEE RICE, M. D.
San Antonio, Texas.

Thousands of people prepare their hearts for inevitable heart disease in the second half of life, by overwork, overeating, obesity, drinking, smoking and insufficient exercise, combined with some chronic infection or the damage to the small blood vessels that occurred before its eradication.

Overstrain is an important factor in the production of heart disease after 40. Until that age has been reached, the various infections, including syphilis, have led the field. In fact, the majority of infections that damage the cardio-vascular system usually occur before 30, and one may enjoy a decade or two of relative immunity. If overstrain has been prevented immediately following these acute illnesses and if they have been properly treated according to the simple and well known plans, then the physician has done his full part in the prevention of heart disease.

Following this mid-period he fills an advisory part, but his advice is practically never accepted until the potential cardiac actually becomes a patient with heart disease.

At 40 practically every individual of the intelligent and cultured classes has been under the social and economic strain of modern life for ten or 15 years. During this period they have been overeating of soft and highly concentrated foods and have become soft from insufficient outdoor exercise. Many have been smoking and drinking and involved in social stress. Mild kidney lesions have become established in a number, and a larger group already have some arterial hypertension. Colonic stasis and focal infections now become an important factor. The thyroid patients require individualized care and the ever present syphilitic must be treated, but the major problem is the recognition of degenerative diseases of the kidney, heart, blood vessels, and liver, and the limitations in exercise and eating and dissipation that are necessary for the arrest of these conditions.

The cardiac patient needs exercise and no digitals if he does not
