Desert Song Presented At Elsinore

The most elaborate musical production offered in Salem in many years, "The Desert Song," musical sensation of the season and characterized by John Philip Sousa as the greatest operatic success of the decade, was presented Thursday evening at the Elsinore theater before an audience which little more than half filled the auditorium.

Those who did attend the operetta, however, considered themselves fortunate for the production proved to be of as much or more interest than the advance notices indicated. The cast for the production includes 150 singers and dancers and is accompanied by a thirty-piece symphony orchestra directed by Cecil Stewart. The music, written by Sigmund Romberg, as in all light operas, is the important element in the production. The type of music in "The Desert Song" ranges from military songs to lyric romantic melodies.

The stage settings for the production added materially to the interest. One of the most effective scenes was the farewell song sung by Red Shadow and his band of Rifles as the sun rose slowly lighting one by one the clouds in the sky and a wider expanse of the tossing seas and desert shore.

The story concerns briefly, the activities of Red Shadow, (Gary G. Breckner), son of the French Governor, (John Merks), who leads his band of Rifles through all sorts of impossible situations occasionally stealing back to his father's home to see Margot Bonvalet (Elvira Taniel), his father's ward, with whom he has fallen in love. Margot, however, after a few years in a French convent, is searching for romance which she does not find at all in Pierre, as the Red Shadow is known at home, who she regards as a spineless creature afraid of fighting and while she is fond of him as a "sister" does not consider him at all the outlaw whom she more than half wishes would capture her. At length in a determined hunt for the outlaw leader, Red Shadow, the French soldiers return with Pierre who discloses the fact that he is not the weak creature his father and Margot have thought him to be but is the leader of the Moroccan Rifles for whom Margot has already admitted her love.

One of the most beautiful musical numbers of the production was the duet by Margot and the Red Shadow which closed the act one.

The comedy element of the production was ably furnished by Benny or Benjamin Kidd, former society correspondent of the Paris Herald who landed, and rather precipitantly, among the Rifles who after much cogitation decided to postpone his death in order that they might avail themselves of his services as a French spy. His numerous blunders placed him in the most amazing circumstances and at last he decided that he and Susan who has shared many of his predicaments with him, are eminently suited for each other, an idea which Susan has been attempting to convey since their first meeting at the Governor's home where she was employed as secretary.

The operetta moved rapidly from one scene to another with no wait for skirts or scenery and the attention of the audience never faltered in the slightest from the opening number of the program until the close.

The music for "The Desert Song" was the outstanding attraction. The chorus work was particularly effective. "The Sabre Song" by Margot, the trio number, "Then You'll Know," sung by Margot, Pierre, and Captain Fontaine; and the duet, "Desert Song," by Margot and Red Shadow were three of the most interesting musical numbers.
