Club Federation To Study Latin-America

News reports from Washington, D. C., bring interesting announcement from officials of the Pan-American Union that the General Federation of Women's Clubs has decided to make Latin-America a part of its national study program.

Mrs. John F. Sippel, the federation president, when she was a visitor in Portland earlier in the summer spoke enthusiastically of the possibilities for such study and expressed desire to see closer relationship between the women of North and South America brought about through the club program. Women of this country, she believes, may benefit greatly by Hispano-American culture and in turn, the women of the southern continent may benefit equally through closer contact and understanding of what North America has to offer.

Spanish-American literature has especially attraction for North American club women, as evidenced in the fact that already more than 600 groups of women have sought the benefit of a unique service instituted by the union three years ago in the form of organized courses of study. The union suggests volumes which might be added to libraries which give local color authentically and present serious commentaries upon Latin-American life. The works of Hugo Wast, they report, are particularly popular, his novels, "Black Valley" and "Stone Valley," being much sought.

RIO DE JANEIRO FINDS IT LIKES AMERICAN DIET

Rio de Janeiro (AP)—Those humble wretches of the American table—ham and eggs, and pork and beans—are being "plugged" in Rio de Janeiro by a chain of restaurants operated by a Brazilian, formerly a Brooklyn, N. Y., hotel owner, and his American wife.

Encouraged by the prairie-fire spread of popularity won by soft drink parlors, a string of restaurants embodying the quick-lunch idea and American cooking, was opened. The innovation won the immediate favor of Brazilians, while Americans, who miss their waffles, pancakes, and maple syrup, find the restaurants apt places for recalling the homeland.

American food and drinks have made much headway in Rio. Despite the fact there is no prohibition law in Brazil, the soft drink emporiums of malted milk and ice cream sodas and sundaes have scored sensational success. Pre-empted by both men and women, it is not unusual to see them completely filled, and not a bottle of liquor in sight, although hard liquor may be had in some of them.

This Americanization really marks a turning point in the habits of the native Brazilian. Ten years ago the "thing to do" was to spend 15 or 30 minutes over a small cup of the country's famous coffee. The new places where you can stand and drink your coffee have had considerable effect in changing customs.

A decade ago malted milk, waffles, hot dogs, etc., were unknown here. Today they are increasingly popular items. The sidewalk bars that once were devoted exclusively to beer and liquor have been affected by the American drinks, and their trade is now made up largely of patrons seeking ice cream or mineral water.

The Americanization process—it cannot be called anything else—includes movies, automobiles, and clothing. Soon it will include the five-and-ten cent stores of the United States. A corporation of Americans and Brazilians has been formed for introducing a chain of these establishments in Rio and the interior. One already has been opened in Niteroy, across the bay from Rio de Janeiro.

Rio's drug stores are still that. They haven't taken over the American plan of selling everything from clocks to phonographs in addition to drugs. But if the rapid introduction of United States' forms of merchandising continues, it perhaps will be our sad duty to report the conversion of the pharmacies into gadget stores.
