DEVICE MAKES HANDS REPLACE EARS OF MUTES

Chicago (AP)—Fingers and hands are taking the place of ears for the little deaf and dumb pupils at the Alexander Graham Bell school in Chicago. An electrical device which magnifies the vibrations of the voice 175 times is held in the hand. Based upon the hypothesis developed by Prof. Robert H. Gault, of the psychology department of Northwestern university, supplied each of the five pupils in a special class, a study of the practicability of the instrument is being made.

The sense of touch is claimed to be the parent sense, by scientists, and Prof. Gault worked upon this principle. The instrument includes an earpiece for those who have any residual hearing, no matter how small the degree, a mouthpiece, and the circular object containing a magnet and diaphragm. The diaphragm registers the spoken vibrations upon the skin of the hand.

Teachers of the deaf and dumb have encouraged their pupils to lay their hands upon the teacher's throat which she was speaking," said Miss Marne Lauritsen, a student of Prof. Gault's and his chief aide in developing the instrument, who is instructing the class, "but as this practice could only be followed one at a time, the rest of the class became inattentive. With this touch-telephone children can not only feel the words coming through it, but can talk into it to each other, and 'hear' each other and the teacher without watching the lips."
