SMUGGLING OF DOPE BECOMES DEADLY WORK

Vancouver, B. C. (AP)—Narcotic smuggling along Canada's Pacific coast is a grim, dangerous and absolutely unromantic business. The Royal Canadian mounted police, who "always get their men," have exercised such cleverness in outwitting the smuggler that a five-tael tin of opium has risen in price from $65 to $125 in the last few months, authorities here announced. Oriental passenger boats, especially those with Chinese crews, are placed under a special guard of the red-coated mounted. A leather-thonged lash awaits any so desperate as to engage in the trade. Big liners are met off quarantine by the deep sea custom launches of the preventive service. Airplanes carrying custom officials equipped with powerful glasses circle over the vessel, and every movement aboard the liner is scanned. Anything aboard overboard is checked up and any small coasting craft that follows in the wake of the larger ship is overhauled and inspected by the launch crew. The minute the ship docks, every square inch is subjected to a thorough search by experienced operatives of the preventive service, armed with electric torches to see into every crevice of the cargo and ship. A constant rowboat patrol is maintained around the ship, and frequently when suspicion has been aroused the bottom of the harbor is combed with grappling hooks and occasionally divers are sent down to explore the ocean's floor for parcels of drugs. Members of government operatives recount strange tales of adventure with "dope" runners, who occasionally are able to slip through the net of the searchers. Undersea caches are visited by divers who row to the spot where the vials of narcotics have slipped from the ship's porthole and sunk to the bottom by weights. Trusted Chinese clerks hide opium in the hollow soles of their shoes. Trunks of high officials, supposedly beyond suspicion, have contained thousands of tael of valuable drugs. These and 100 other trickeries are resorted to by operators of the traffic.

COLDS MAY DEVELOP INTO PNEUMONIA

Coughs from colds may lead to serious trouble. You can stop them now with Creomulsion, an emulsified crocotein that is pleasant to take. Creomulsion is a medical discovery with two-fold action; it soothes and heals the inflamed membranes and inhibits germ growth. Of all known drugs crocotein is recognized by high medical authorities as one of the greatest healing agencies for coughs from colds and bronchial irritations. Creomulsion contains, in addition to crocotein, other healing
