Happy Pre-Christmas Sport Suddenly Turns Into Fearful Tragedy

Miskegon, Mich. (U.P.)—A little child led his parents, his brother, and three others to their death Sunday when he glided across the treacherous ice of Errgang lake on a Christmas sled wheedled out of Santa Claus six days ahead of schedule. Just a half hour before the sun dropped behind the tall tree tops, lining the lake 35 miles northeast of here, seven year old Orval Oman had climaxed his plea for the shiny new sled he knew was to be his Christmas day.

"The ice is melting, ma. It will be gone by Christmas."

She nodded her head in assent and the happy, laughing youngster skipped to the lake shore and dashed himself and sled on the two inch ice for a good old "belly buster."

Out he skimmed, a mile a minute it seemed.

The smiling parents, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Oman, both 33, watched from the door of their house nearby.

There was a warning crack of ice. The boy screamed in fright, and plunged a second later into a gaping hole, 50 feet from shore.

The father, Albert Oman, 33, followed by the mother, heedless of danger, raced over the ice toward the struggling figure. Ten feet from his goal, Oman too, fell through the ice. His wife plunged through near him.

Harry Errgang, 29, who lived near the Omans, walked to the edge of the creaking ice and dived to save his sister.

Fred, 17, and Teddy Morgan, 14, who lived with Errgang, walked more carefully on the ice, trying to save someone. They fell in 10 feet from shore.

Oliver, 12, brother of Orval, rushed up, evaded frantic efforts of his aunt, Mrs. Martha Morgan, whose two boys now were struggling in the icy water, and tried to swim to his mother.

Realizing she was the only adult for more than a mile around, Mrs. Morgan ran bare headed to the home of Cral Franke, former township supervisor, for help. Even before she was out of sight, the last of the seven in the tiny lake was still.

Only Gloria, three, remains alive of the Oman family.

Mrs. Morgan, whose husband was in Chicago, is in a hospital here Monday, hysterical with shock and exposure.

Mrs. Errgang, mother of Harry, lives in a little house on the hill by the lake. The three are the only survivors of the families affected living in the community.

Five bodies were recovered by a party headed by Coroner Tiede Clock. Two men dragged the lake during the night for the bodies of Orval and his uncle.

JEPTHA T. HUNT DIES IN SALEM

shaped itself. And when in his late years he assumed a position in the county as one of the county's road builders he saw a chance for such a dream to come true. As far back as 1924 he began to agitate the idea of a road from Salem into the Central Oregon country. As county judge a few years later he began an active campaign for it. This campaign he conducted quietly and no one will know how many trips he made, how many appearances before highway commissions and commissioners, before federal officials, civic bodies or before anyone or any organization that might be able to help. Seconded by his commissioners, J. E. Smith and John H. Porter, the county judge made the prospective highway the center of his activities during the final years of his judgeship. And when ill-health forced him to relinquish that post he passed on to his successor, John Siegmund, present county judge, the job of finishing what he had started. To Judge Hunt the news that the highway through federal aid was at last an assured success was the high point in life and since then he frequently expressed the hope that he might be spared long enough to make one trip over the new road on its completion.

Jeptha Thomas Hunt was born February 12, 1862, the son of George W., and Elizabeth Smith Hunt, pioneers of 1847. The old donation land claim where he grew up, five miles east of Salem, is the only original donation land claim in the county which remains intact as taken up by his father and mother, a complete section of 640 acres. His sister, Sarah Hunt (Mrs. B. L. Steeves) is the sole surviving member of the family of six children. On June 18, 1886, he was married to Myrta E. White who also survives him the devoted companion through the years of fair weather and of long illness. Four children also survive, Clarence J. Hunt, Marion F. Hunt, Mrs. Helen Tate, all of Stayton, and Norris E. Hunt, who makes his home on the old donation claim.

Judge Hunt was a member of the First Christian Church of Salem. Funeral services will be held Wednesday afternoon at 1:30 o'clock from the Rigdon Chapel, with the Rev. D. J. Howe officiating. Interment will be made in the I. O. O. F. cemetery.

No man in Marion county had a wider group of friends than the late county judge who never knowingly did an act that would injure anyone. Mild mannered and mild tempered, yet he had a dogged persistency in any cause he believed the right one which held through to the end as indicated in his almost lifelong labors for the highway over the mountains.

He became county commissioner of the county on January 3, 1917, elected to succeed J. T. Beckwith. On January 1, 1925 he became county judge, which position he resigned about November 1, 1927 due to his health. His successor, Judge Siegmund, was appointed December 1 of that year.

For many years Judge Hunt operated a general store on his ranch and with marked success until conditions changed which, with advancing years, caused him to relinquish it. For some years he was president of the Bank of Stayton.

If there was one other thing as close to his heart as the Santiam highway it was the Oregon state fair. Through the years he was a constant attendant of the fair and lived at his house in the campgrounds. He had hoped to be at the last one, had had his wood brought in and arrangements made to move to his camphouse but the state of his health precluded it. He was a member of the fair board for many years and also for years he contributed products from his farm for exhibit there.

A mark of the calibre of the late county judge was shown to his friends when he and Henry Downing were candidates for the county judgeship at the election in 1924. Mr. Hunt was a candidate as a commissioner. Judge Downing was then county judge under appointment by Governor Pierce. Together the two men worked on the commissioners' board during the campaign. They had been friends from boyhood days on adjoining farms in the Waldo Hills. Hunt was a republican, Downing a democrat. Yet during the campaign in their association together they remained firm friends, joked as to the outcome and did not permit the hot political battle raging to mar the friendship which had continued through the years.

Judge Hunt was most unassuming as a citizen and in his official capacity, whatever it was. What he did as an office holder he did with the feeling that he had a conscientious duty to perform and he performed it in that manner—regardless of criticism or praise. And the same was the record of his private life.

BOY'S PAROLE NOT GRANTED BY HARTLEY

from the testimony of "well corroborated experts" and his past record, is "an incipient Hickman," unsafe to be at large, the governor explained.

Furthermore, he said, any action permitting the 12-year-old boy, sentenced to life imprisonment for shooting and killing Sheriff Wormell as the officer caught him in the act of robbing an Asotin store, to be removed from the state of Washington would be tantamount to giving him complete release.

"Apparently many persons do not realize the moment Herbert stepped outside the boundaries of this state he would be free," the governor wrote. "If his relatives wanted him back in Idaho, or wished to take him to some other state there would be no legal obstacles to overcome. Legal authority over the boy could not be vested in you or any other agency outside of this state by executive action."

The letter assured Father Flanagan the state of Washington could guarantee Herbert the fullest opportunities in life.

The manner in which Father Flanagan entered the Niccolls case was decried by the governor. The letter referred to the Nebraska educator's appeals for custody of Herbert "through the press, from the pulpit, and from 44 radio stations as attempts to focus national attention on his boy's home.

"After Herbert's trial was concluded and the boy delivered to the penitentiary," the governor wrote, "you entered the case, seizing the opportunity to direct nation-wide attention to your boys' home, facilitated by the sensational publicity that attended the trial. The people whose sympathies had been stirred by the accounts of the trial viewed your appeal as an act of mercy that no state nor governor should deny."

"Certain sensational newspapers had almost despaired of keeping the Niccolls case on the front page when you came to the rescue.

"What a happy situation—Father Flanagan needed these newspapers as a vehicle to supplement his appeals; these newspapers needed Father Flanagan in the role of humanitarian.

"In my judgment nothing in recent years has taken place so detrimental to the youth of our land as the melodramatic publicity and exploitation which attended your trip to the state of Washington and the request to have this boy turned over to your institution."

The governor's office during the past month has been deluged with thousands of letters and petitions, for and against releasing Herbert, from all sections of the country.

"Not a word of consolation or sympathy was extended to the bereaved family of the sheriff who was killed in the performance of his duty—seven brothers and sisters, a widow and four children—entirely forgotten."

"Sympathetic people, particularly those far removed from the scene of the crime, were stirred by these subtle misrepresentations and persuaded that this boy was being dealt with inhumanely and that a grave injustice had been done," the letter said.

The governor said he was deeply impressed by the sincere sympathy prompting many persons in their concern for the well being of Herbert.

"Let me assure these a well ordered routine fills his days, embracing all activities necessary to fully develop him, even excelling the opportunity of many boys on the outside."

ENGINEERS OPPOSE BASIN PROJECT

cultural products in the country, making the placing of more new land under cultivation appear undesirable.

Congressman Horr was outspoken in his opposition to the engineers' findings.

"The army engineers' action is only the beginning of this battle," he said. "The project is so vital to my state it will be the subject of vigorous action. I intend to press the fight as vigorously as I can."

A previous report by Major John S. Butler, an army engineer who studied the project, together with findings by reclamation engineers, he said, had found the basin development feasible from both the engineering and economic viewpoints.

Senators Dill and Wesley L. Jones have been pressing for congressional approval of the project for several years. They obtained authority, three years ago, for the survey which has just been completed, at a cost of $600,000.

The report said that the proposed Columbia river development was divided into two projects, one for power development below the mouth of the Snake river with which was combined a proposal to improve navigation to a depth of nine feet as far as tidewater, and the other a combined project for the development of water power at the Grand Coulee dam and for the irrigation of a large tract of land known as the "Columbia basin."

"The board is not convinced of the advisibility of the United States participating in the construction of either of these two projects at the present time," it said.

Of the lower Columbia development, the report said in part:

"The project on the lower river is primarily a power project on a very large scale, an ultimate installation of over 4,000,000 kilowatts being contemplated. The estimated cost of the complete project is more than $450,000,000.

"At the present time there is no market for this large amount of power and very many years would be required before such a market could be developed. The navigation improvement is only a minor adjunct of the power development."

Disapproval was also voiced of the proposed development work on the upper Columbia, above the mouth of the Snake. In addition to the declaration that unneeded power would be developed, it was argued that "bringing new land under cultivation" was not justified at the present time.

"The Grand Coulee power and irrigation project also involved a very large power development. It has been estimated that a period of 25 years might elapse after the completion of the construction before the entire power could be disposed of.

"The cost of irrigation by this project is high and it would be impossible to finance the project on the basis of returns from the sale of irrigation water even if no interest charges were considered.

"The financing of the entire combined project by the combined receipts from the sale of water and the sale of power might be possible under certain conditions. Such financing would require the use of the profits of the power development to provide irrigation.

"Whether or not such profits would be sufficient would be dependent upon the growth of the demand for electric power over a period in the comparatively distant future. The total investment required would be in the neighborhood of $400,000,000.

"Agriculture in the United States has been suffering from overproduction for a considerable period of years. It does not appear that large expenditures by the federal government for the purpose of bringing new land under cultivation are justified at the present time."

In conclusion, an offer was made for all parties interested in the proposed development to submit, within a period of 40 days, statements and arguments.

The report will be given to the secretary of war and eventually be reported to congress.

Senator Frederick Steiwer of Oregon commented Monday that the setback suffered by the mammoth Columbia river development is expected to react favorably for the long-urged Umatilla Rapids development plan.

The Oregon delegation was not available for a caucus Sunday but a meeting was expected Monday at which a program of work will be outlined.

Representative Butler of Oregon said "it seems to me the board has overlooked or minimized the importance of navigation on the Columbia. I am greatly disappointed that such is the case."

Senator Steiwer and Representative Butler announced they intend to urge adoption at the present session of the resolution to open river improvement on the upper Columbia and on the Snake river to Pittsburgh landing.

This resolution contemplates such improvement as will make barge navigation practicable and is estimated to cost less than $1,000,000. This step should be taken, they say.

SEEK LIMITATION ON SLUSH FUNDS

pointed to investigate, candidates for 35 seats in the senate spent $5,505,712. The combined annual salaries of all senators elected in that campaign, the committee reported, would aggregate only $350,000. Expenditures were comparatively moderate in 15 states which elected 17 senators in 1930, but in the other 18 states expenditures ranged from $63,000 to $2,000,000, and they aggregated $4,898,121.

The proposed bill would centralize responsibility for every expenditure upon the candidate or his agent, by making it unlawful to solicit or expend funds in behalf of a candidate without his express authorization.

"The use of such large sums," the report said, "is incompatible with a free and uncontrolled expression of the will of the people, and with the maintenance of even a semblance of the equality of opportunity for citizens to seek public office, which is the very foundation of genuine democracy.

"Under this plan the candidate becomes legally responsible for the expenditures of all persons and committees whom he or his agent has authorized to act in his behalf, while all unauthorized persons and committees receiving contributions or making campaign expenditures become subject to the penalties provided in the bill. This will effectively curb the growing activities of 'political racketeers', who use the names of popular candidates to enrich themselves.

The limits on senators and representatives include campaigns for nomination as well as election, and the nomination campaigns are further limited to four cents a vote for representatives and two cents a vote for senators. The bill would forbid bringing from outside any state any funds for use in influencing election of a representative or senator, except that the national committees of the parties will be permitted to distribute money for campaign purposes.
