HEADS BROKEN BY VIOLENCE IN POLITICS

Berlin (AP)—With broken heads almost as numerous as election mass meetings in the last two hectic months of campaigning in Germany, both extremes of the political circle have begun to take account of the toll of political clashes which, up to the Prussian Diet elections in April, had become an almost daily occurrence somewhere in the Reich.

Since exact totals are not kept by the police, each party organization lists its own toll of deaths and wounding. Inquiries at both Communist and National Socialist sources, covering the last eight years, gives a total of 462 killed in clashes which can be traced to clearly political motives.

If deaths of party members during political service, which can not be traced clearly to clashes or free-for-all fighting are counted, such as single encounters or accidents, this probably would exceed 600. This does not include the Kapp Putsch of 1920, which would bring the figures well above the thousand mark. Wounding during the past eight years can be estimated at 16 to 18 thousand.

As part of the campaign for the Prussian Diet elections, the "German League for Human Rights," a Communist organization, shortly before election day opened an exhibition at busy Potsdamer Platz, entitled "Political Terrorism," in which they listed the deaths of their party members as totaling 186 since 1922.

The case histories of each victim were listed and on file for inspection. These deaths were attributed to the National Socialists, and the exhibition was illustrated with pictures of some of the victims, charts with dates, and quotations of alleged National Socialist threats. The history of the Kapp Putsch also was depicted in charts and figures.

The National Socialists have not placed their casualties on exhibition, but their estimates, obtained from headquarters at Munich, place their death toll at 276 up to the beginning of 1932.

This figure probably would be slightly higher if the election toll could be counted in. The Hitlerites list a total of over 10,000 wounded seriously in the last four years. The 1931 figures are 41 dead and 6,189 severely wounded.

The "League for Human Rights" exhibition also included a glass-enclosed cabinet containing various assortments of blackjacks, pistols, brass and spiked knuckles, lead piping and one hand-made grenade as examples of the weapons taken in various political encounters.

American passenger automobiles imported into France last year numbered 4,157.
