SEEK TO STOP LION HUNT IN OZARK WILDS

St. Louis, Oct. 8 (UP)—The humane society and the attorney general were all that stood between four St. Louis men and a thrilling lion hunt in the "jungles" of southeast Missouri today.

The men had the lions—two of them—the jungle, the guns, and the courage (they said), but the Missouri humane society has asked the attorney general to declare lions out of season.

Denver M. Wright, manufacturer, is the promoter of the proposed "big game" hunt. He bought the lions from a former circus employe who had taken them instead of salary.

Wright paid out $75 for the two shaggy and almost toothless beasts of the jungle. He put them in a cage in his back yard. Their nightly terrifying roars enraged the neighborhood and sent children running for home.

Three friends of Wright had been invited to accompany him and the lions to southeast Missouri where he said he had found 24,000 acres of "jungle" in which a white man's axe has never fallen.

He plans to turn the lions loose in the woods late some afternoon and then he and his companions, led by dogs, plan to take up the hunt. "Sort of bring Africa to the United States," Wright explained.

"I've always done a lot of hunting," Wright said. "I go out each season and usually come back with my game bag carrying the limit of ducks, quail or rabbits."

"Are these lions vicious, man-eating beasts," he was asked. "I don't exactly know," the sportsman replied. "They look like lions and they roar like lions and they eat like lions. I guess they're lions. They eat 12 pounds of raw beef a day."

Erich Hansen, manager of the Missouri humane society has announced his opposition to the hunt. "A dangerous and foolhardy stunt," Hansen said, and added he had wired a protest to the attorney general and the state game and fish commissioner.
