The report, Radek said, instigates Japan to attack the Soviet union, but at the same time tries to leave an opening for possible inclusion of the Soviets in an eventual united

of the Soviets in an eventual united front against Japan. He called the Lytton report interesting chiefly because it reveals how international imperialism would like to settle the far eastern question if Japan could be forced to comply—namely: they would turn Manchuria into an "international colony under international gendarmes" and re-establish an international consortion bank for all China. He said the Soviets were not concealing their opinion of Japanese aggression in Manchuria but did not intend to be embroiled in war.
