POSSIBILITIES OF VALLEY TOLD TO ALBANY MEN

Albany—The Willamette valley, a land of diversified resources and opportunity and susceptible to the highest type of development and citizenship, was vividly explained Wednesday by State Senator Douglas McKay of Salem in an address before the Albany chamber of commerce.

Senator McKay is chairman of the Willamette valley projects committee, co-ordinating the efforts of committees to take the lead in the development of this valley. He said his committee was selected primarily to arouse public interest in the valley as to its possibilities and problems, to urge cooperation with the state planning board and to assist in arousing interest in members of congress from Oregon in securing funds for certain lines of work.

He suggested five lines of activity essential to the development of the valley: flood control for the 180,000 acres between Albany and Eugene, subject to flood drainage for the 873,000 acres in the valley; irrigation; essential and profitable on certain types of land; stream pollution of the Willamette to be eliminated, and the river made a greater asset, and navigation on the Willamette from Portland to Eugene.

In the Willamette valley there are 28,273 farms, averaging 93 acres each, of which an average of 33 acres is in cultivation, he stated. Increased production demands increased marketing privileges. In answer to this problem he visualized this section of the country as the most inviting on this continent and that in the near future increased population would take care of the market for the agricultural products.
