A Change of Tune

Cooperation with the ideals of the New Deal by industry is indicated by the address of C. M. Chester of New York, president of the National Association of Manufacturers before the Chicago Association of Commerce. He declared it was "industry's duty to raise the standards of living for the general happiness of all the people." He offered the following suggestions:

- Eliminate all child labor and sweatshops; combat any producing, distribution or labor monopolies; join in a program of modernization, re-building and replacement; help create gainful employment; formulate a definite company policy with respect to personnel relations. Pay equitable rates of wages, with vacations with pay for hour workers and periodic review of individual earnings. Recognize social obligations and economic value of providing safeguards against industrial employment hazards and of establishing private plans for meeting death, disability, old age and unemployment problems.

To symbolize the desire of manufacturers "to cooperate wholeheartedly with the government for the benefit of the country as a whole," a series of dinners will be staged in Washington and ten cities in celebration of the centenary of the patent system on November 23.

These expressions of cooperation will be welcomed because they suggest a future united republic and a change of policy by industrial leaders, whose policies on public issues in the election campaign have proven obsolete. It was only last December 5 when the N. M. A. declared a blood feud on President Roosevelt and New Deal policies, upholding the old order and denouncing the new, as an "alien importation," a course followed by the National Chamber of Commerce.

By active cooperation with the government instead of open antagonism, industry can effectually end the depression and prevent its recurrence. Such cooperation has been forthcoming in England and its beneficial results are apparent in stabilized prosperity. Government can't do it alone, neither can industry, but by united effort it can be accomplished.

Commendable Courage

Decision of the capitol building commission to utilize white marble for the exterior finish for the new state house should be commended by those who can visualize the appearance of the structure, set as it will be in the midst of evergreen trees and shrubs, during such weather as Salem is just now experiencing.

A state capitol should be symbolical in general appearance as well as architectural detail and it should be utilitarian. But above all it should be inspiring. There is little inspiration to be gained out of a dull, drab building which blends into and submerges itself in the depressing effect of grey fogs and dark, low hanging clouds.

Beauty and grace in the structure should not be sacrificed for narrow provincialism, desirous as it may be to encourage home industry through the utilization of Oregon products.

It is to be expected that the capitol commission will be criticized for many of its decisions, and it will be condemned as it has been condemned before for permitting the use of materials and artisans not native of Oregon. Such criticism is the creation of narrow minds and selfish prejudices which ridicule the artistic and ignore the practical. It should further be remembered that the federal government is a party to construction and that in accepting a PWA grant of 45 percent of the cost the state of Oregon waived all rights to restrict free American competition.

In their conscientious endeavor to give Oregon a beautiful and practical capitol building the members of the commission are entitled to public cooperation and enthusiastic support.

Nebraska's Experiment

Nebraska is staging an interesting experiment in electing the first one house state legislature ever chosen in the United States and it will be watched with interest to see how far this reform ends the abuses of two house legislatures. The new system was fathered by Senator George W. Norris.

The bi-cameral state legislature was copied from the two houses of congress, which in turn from the British parliament, composed of hereditary peers and of commons, and designed as balance checks. The unicameral legislature is based upon the same theory that has prompted most cities to do away with two room city councils and center responsibility in one body which makes both for responsiveness to public opinion and for efficiency, thus curtailing buck-passing and parliamentary log-jams, engineered by lobbyists.

Business corporations have a single board of directors and thereby evade the irresponsibility of conflicting bodies with their technicalities and their jokers. The single chamber has worked well in cities, but in a state it may develop other evils. It is well that Nebraska has provided the experiment, which if successful, will be widely emulated.

WORK ON COUNTY ROAD MAP 'TIL JUNE

While details of the new county road map have been worked out covering road numbering and some other features the WPA project handling the map and other road data is expected to continue on into next June or July at least, County Engineer Hubbs said today.

The project also contemplates a name and number for every bridge and culvert in the county which there are hundreds. The numbers will work in with the road numbers. Bridges and culverts will be given numbers in a series on each road, being numbered from east to west or from north to south, according to the direction in which the road lies. Thus it will be possible to locate any bridge or culvert in the county at almost instant's notice. For instance, a bridge designated bridge No. 3 on road No. 425, which, if the road runs east and west, will indicate the third bridge from the east end of the road. Considerable other data will be assembled under the project to simplify the handling of county road work which has become a big business in itself in the past 10 years.

News Behind The News

By Paul Mallon

Washington, Nov. 21—During the next sixty days you will witness some important news developments now in the making, which will show that the hoped-for "era of good feeling" is not just a phrase. A strong disposition is developing among business leaders to take hold of national economic issues and furnish some self-leadership toward their solution, before the government does. Few realists seem to be deluding themselves with visions of conditions they would like to have, but are getting ready to meet conditions with which they are confronted. They are tired of politics. They offer very little criticism of the president, even in private. Sincerely, they want to cooperate with him and among themselves.

There will be no more conferences criticizing the new deal program, but several more things along the line of the recent wage increases. These increases may have been inspired by the new taxes on undistributed earnings, but were nevertheless a forerunner of a real cooperative effort to absorb unemployment, increase purchasing power and get things started on a substantial basis. The impending change of front is the best possible assurance anyone can get of increased business activity in the immediate future. It almost guarantees progress.

Misunderstanding — Chairman Farley seems to be better calling elections than in foretelling what Harry Hopkins is going to do with the WPA. His remark abroad that WPA would be turned back to the states caused a hectic few hours on the inside here, but it was really not his fault. Apparently what happened was that Farley said it would be done "sometime soon," meaning within the next few years. But Mr. Roosevelt has hastened to make
