

FLOOR DEBATE PROBABLE ON DRINKING ADS

The Oregon legislature appeared today for a floor debate over the liquor advertising when the house committee on alcoholic beverages turned down a proposal to prohibit liquor advertising by a 6-2 vote.

It was the second time that such a bill had met defeat in a committee. A minority report being prepared by the lone dissenter indicated that the floor debate would receive considerable attention from the legislature.

A public hearing preceded the committee's action, with an hour given over to speakers from both sides.

Ray Gill, State Grange master, headed a list of proponents of the measure. Most of the arguments presented by those favoring the bill centered on the belief that advertising was increasing the use of alcoholic liquor, especially among the young.

The opposition group pointed out that to stop radio and national magazine advertising within the state was impractical, and that passage of the bill would be an unfair discrimination against newspapers.

Ray Gill, State Grange master, headed the battle cry for the proponents of the measure, when he declared "We wanted (when the law was enacted) to stop the increase in the use of liquor . . . to promote temperance . . . advertising tends to increase the use of alcoholic beverages . . . and the increase in consumption of liquor is all upon youth."

D. O. Johnson, head of the Anti-liquor league in Oregon praised the Knox law as one of the strongest of its kind in the union. He further declared that public sentiment was against advertising of liquor.

Walter Kline, Portland attorney, and chairman of the civic affairs committee, held that the liquor commission possessed the right to prohibit advertising through the words "control and regulate" in the statute.

Representing the W.C.T.U. was Mrs. Buck, who declared that "no government has a right to legalize that which is harmful to its people."

Another speaker among those favoring the bill was E. C. Farnham, who held that the liquor traffic was "killing itself."

B. S. Martin concluded for the proponents by citing postal laws holding that nationally-circulated magazines containing liquor advertisements could not gain admittance to a state where such advertising was illegal.

An opinion from the attorney general was read, declaring that enactment of the law would in no way interfere with federal statutes.

Opening up for the opposition to the bill, Arnie Rae, field secretary of the Oregon State Publishing association, pointed out that newspapers constituted only a part of advertising methods. He also introduced statistics to show that out-of-state newspapers had considerable circulation in Oregon, and that national magazines had a wide circulation.

Denying earlier assertions that importations of these magazines could be prohibited if they carried liquor ads, Rae declared that magazines furnished a much more effective avenue of advertisement of liquors than newspapers.

Rae also vouched for the sincere efforts of publishers to cooperate with the liquor commission in eliminating objectionable advertisements.

After a period of "wild-eyed advertising" he said, papers have settled down into a respectable method for advertising of liquors.

Robert G. Mounts, representing the Portland newspapers, made the declaration that a magazine will not accommodate adverse laws against certain advertising by eliminating the offensive page. He read letters from Oregon publishers on the matter, and declared that all were anxious to cooperate in promoting temperance.

"But why put us at an unfair disadvantage when the law authorizes and protects the sale of liquor?" was the plea of the publishers' representatives.

As the hearing concluded, the packed room emptied to allow the committee to take action. When the vote was taken a minority report. He gave as his reason "the effect of alcoholic liquor advertising on youth."
