Middle Road Policy for Business Men

In its efforts to obtain for itself a place in the sun, labor has been as aggressive as have its employers. But labor has been more methodical. It has perfected a technique which enables it to get the upper hand in its disputes with a less vigilant if not less militant body of business employers.

Carl W. Hogg, Salem, was elected permanent convention chairman. Called primarily for the purpose of considering the labor question in retail stores throughout the state, the convention will strive to set up a general policy toward unions and at the same time strengthen the resources of employers of any labor trouble that might develop, it was stated.

In the "keynote" address of the day, B. A. Klicka, McMinnville, lashed forth against labor unions, asserting that Oregon merchants were being made "victims of foreign agitators."

He attacked the use of picketing and charged that retailers in this state were "faced with a crisis worse than that of any other country." He slammed the labor policies of President Roosevelt and Secretary of Labor Perkins was also administered by the keynoteur who declared that despite the huge spending program "this country is down in the depths."

Spokesmen for the conservative element, however, expressed a confidence that the convention would adopt a "fair" attitude toward labor unions. The main purpose of the convention, they insisted, was to settle on a definite policy and to obtain a coherent program for all merchant-employers of Oregon.

"Labor organization practically destroyed England," Klicka said, "with the result that they kicked it overboard." He went on to declare that the labor element in Italy and Germany had created chaos and that Mussolini and Hitler had to "establish order."

"Whatever social troubles we had in the golden days from 1860 to 1929," he charged, "were a rash on the skin." They did not call for a surgical operation.

Klicka's address highlighted the morning session, which also saw the election of Carl W. Hogg, Salem, as convention chairman.

Address of welcome was given by Mayor V. E. Kuhn, and response by Reynolds Allen, chairman of the Salem Merchants association, who expressed belief that "out of this convention will emerge clear thinking, accurate impressive expression in your community."

The organization, it was indicated by several leaders, will be governed by an executive board of seven members, plus a president and secretary-treasurer. A permanent manager will be hired to coordinate the association's membership.

Salem is slated to be the permanent headquarters of the association.

The technique employed by association members, when a labor dispute arises, was outlined by convention officers.

All negotiations between an association member and the union must be referred to the central headquarters and passed upon by the executive board. This means, in effect, that the entire association will act with the individual member in settling his labor problem.

The afternoon session did not get under way until 3 o'clock, with reports from committees appointed by chairman and convention committee, which is composed of representatives of the Salem Merchants' association.
