Answer: Cover a card table with a white tea cloth and put the wedding cake on this alone. After you have cut the first piece (which, according to custom, you share with the groom), the guests either go over to the table and cut themselves pieces, or else some one who is strong-handed and experienced in cutting thin slivers of fruitcake cuts a few pieces at a time. After these have been taken, then some more is cut. You should also provide a stack of waxed paper (six or seven inches square) so that those who want to take their piece of cake home to dream on, can do so. The only other way would be to stack small boxes of wedding cake on a table for each one to take a box home. But this preparation is difficult to do at home and expensive to have done at a caterer's—and even so does not replace the wedding cake.

Answer: A house coat that is a long princess dress, zippered (or buttoned) down the front—the sort of dress that is meant to be worn around the house—would be very suitable. But a negligee that looks as though it might be an elaborate nightgown would not do at all.

Dear Mrs. Post: At my wedding reception it would work out much better in our house to serve the ice cream and little cakes on plates direct from the kitchen. I want to have these passed by six small cousins who would feel very important to have a part in my wedding. But if the plan is followed, what about having a wedding cake? There would be no buffet table set for the refreshments and no place for the wedding cake to be displayed and then cut.
