New Steusloff Structure Nears Finish

The recently razed Steusloff building which had been a landmark at the northwest corner of Court and Liberty streets since 1903, is being replaced by an entirely new structure costing $45,000.

The new building, 35 by 100 feet in size, will be a completely modern reinforced concrete structure with three full floors, including a basement designed for retail business use, will be ready soon.

Sally's, for whom an exceptionally attractive store has been designed, has made rapid progress in merchandising women's apparel in its six years' existence here. This change in location, from 357 Court street, is necessitated by growth of the business and consequent need for larger, more modern quarters, according to the Schlesinger-Bloomberg-Schlesinger company, operators of the store. The proprietors predicted yesterday that their new store would be one of the finest, inside and out, on the Pacific coast.
