

Room and Board . . . By Gene Ahern

stuff to carry out to the farm for the party. The place has to be almost completely done over — I mean cleaned from cellar to attic.

"Working nights?"

"Partly, yes. But I'm going to do a lot of reading too. I want to study some parts so's to be able to show Paul and Ruby that I have ability."

"Oh, that!"

"Yes, that!" said Kathleen.

"But you needn't take such an unpleasant tone. I'm not being unpleasant about you giving so much time to writing your play."

"No, you're not," said Joe.

"But that's because you're more or less glad to have me occupied. It gives you more time to spend with Paul and Fred."

UNFAIR TO LOVE By Watkins E. Wright

Chapter I

"That's exactly what I mean," said Kathleen. "He doesn't appeal to me sentimentally."

"Oh, well, you may change. Even if you don't, one has to make sacrifices for one's art."

"I wish that you'd keep on being silent," said Kathleen.

"Hey, wait a minute!" Joe called, as she started off. "What did you do with that bottle?"

"It's there by the tree," Kathleen answered.

"Okay!" said Joe. "I made a deposit on it."

"Well, of all things! Worrying about a silly little deposit of a few pennies."

"My darling," said Joe, "pennies count nowadays."

He watched Kathleen go on her way, shaking his head there in the shadow of the big old tree. Such a sweet little thing to look at, and such an exasperating little thing to listen to. Then he put thoughts of Kathleen from his mind, and arose to greet Ruby.

"You were swell," he said, and meant it. "You got right under the skin of Letty, and made her live."

"Thank you, Joe," said Ruby. She sat down beside him. "You sound as though you really mean what you say."

"I do," said Joe. "I hope if I ever get a play produced, the actress will make my heroine live as you made Letty live. I liked you a lot, Ruby—really I did."

"Joe, you're sweet!" Ruby leaned back against the trunk of the tree. "And this is a heavenly spot. I'm falling in love with it."

"The barn, you mean?" asked Joe.

"Yes. And the country all around it."

Joe instinctively placed his arm about her, drew her to him. Ruby did not resist. She relaxed against him—like a little girl who was all tired out from too much running about. They sat thus, silent understanding. And Joe knew that he would always remember the moment. It was a sweet moment to remember—Ruby, with her appealing perfume, the dark, star-speckled sky, the sound of sleepy insects. "Something for me to remember in my old age," he thought. Presently Ruby stirred.

"It's dear of you, Joe," she said. "To let me rest here like this. I know you must be wanting to get back into the gaiety."

"You're wrong," Joe said. "I like this much better. The two of us here together sort of—of—understanding, not needing to talk a lot of chatter."

"It is nice," said Ruby. "I like it also."

And they relaxed again, gazing off toward the barn. But they did not know, of course, that Kathleen and Paul were also relaxing—sitting upon a bench, their backs against the barn's wall.

"And do you suppose," Kathleen was saying, "that Ruby really will do something about Joe's play, if she likes it?"

"I wouldn't be surprised," said Paul. "She does seem to want to try starring herself. But getting a producer interested, and finding backing means a lot."

"Yes, I suppose so," Kathleen was thoughtful for a moment. "Has the author of 'Goodbye, Honey Chile!' gotten his backing?"

"I'm not sure about that," Paul replied. "But I hear some scouts are being sent down from New York to watch the production here in Linville."

"Then if I had a small part—the scouts would see me!"

"Unless they're stone blind," said Paul. He took one of Kathleen's hands, and laid it against his cheek—a gesture he was using that week in the first act of the play. "You are mighty easy to look at."

"And you are going to give me a chance, aren't you?" said Kathleen. She leaned forward, so that she could watch Paul's face. "It means so much to me."

"I know it does," said Paul.

"I'll bring the script of the play out to the barbecue. You can read it, and tell me what you think."

"But I know I'll love the play," said Kathleen. "May I read aloud to you the role you have in mind for me?"

"Of course you may," said Paul. He pressed the hand he held to his lips—a gesture he used in the second act of the play. "You go with moonlight and roses," he said, his voice husky with emotion. "You spell romance—Kathleen, my sweet one."

"Thank you," Kathleen said. "I love having you say things like that to me, Paul."

She had forgotten completely that only a short time before, when with Joe Neely, she had used the expression "sentimental nonsense."

Sarcasm

It was 1 o'clock in the morning when Joe walked over to the barn.

"Sorry to interrupt such a charming scene," he said, "but I'm a working man. I have to get home for some sleep." He smiled at Kathleen, who edged away from Paul. "Mind going now?"

"Certainly not," Kathleen said. "I've been wondering what was keeping you."

"And I," said Joe, "thought you were coming back to the old tree. Ruby and I were discussing my play."

Kathleen got up, held out her hand to Paul. "Goodnight, Paul," she said. "Thanks so much for the helpful talk. I'm going to be pretty busy for the next few days, getting the old farmhouse in shape for the party—but drop by whenever you feel like it."

"Thanks," said Paul. "I'll do that. Good-night, and good luck." He turned to Joe. "Same to you, Neely. When does Ruby expect to produce your play?"

"We haven't gotten that far," said Joe. "Coming, Kathleen?"

Kathleen walked away with him. "You needn't have bitten the man's head off," she said, when they were getting into the car.

"What man?" said Joe—as if he didn't know.

"Paul, of course. He was only interested in the play. That's all."

"Maybe. But I didn't like the sarcasm I detected in his voice."

"That was your imagination," said Kathleen.

"My imagination is never sarcastic," Joe retorted.

They rode back to town in silence. But Kathleen's silence was a pleasant one—that is, to herself. In spite of the strained relations that had sprung up between her and Joe, her heart was singing. Matters were certainly looking up for her—and she wasn't going to worry her head about Joe and their disagreements.

Cozy Picture

"You and Paul made a cozy picture—sitting with your backs to the old barn," Joe said, as he brought the car to a standstill in front of the Vaughan residence. "Terribly cozy—and romantic."

"Really?" said Kathleen.

"You saw us that way because you'd just made a cozy and romantic picture with Ruby—sitting beneath the old oak tree."

"Maybe," Joe got out, held the car door open for Kathleen.

"How about a date one night this week? Bette Davie is going to be on at the Galax theater."

"Sorry, Joe," said Kathleen. "I'm not making any dates. I've got so much to do—digging up
