ISLAND SONG

Chapter 18

The men in the boats were silent. They hadn't seen him! There was still hope! They might row past him in the dark—if he kept quiet. Silently, he floated, only his head showing, his nerves tense. The boats came charging down upon him, passed twenty feet away as he held his breath, his heart knocking so loud it seemed as though they must hear. Silently the boats slid away into the night and were gone.

Jason sighed with relief. Boats from some merchant ship, probably. Nevertheless, he didn't want to be picked up by strangers, who might give him away. Better swim across to the beach at the lower end of town.

The firing from the fort had stopped long since. The torches also had been snuffed out. Jason guessed that the guards were sending a searching party around by land to cut him off when he tried to enter the town by way of the beach. He must reach that beach first!

Rested now from his strenuous efforts, he struck out boldly, with strong, even strokes toward a strip of sandy beach he could see just ahead.

It was dark along the beach. In the town, lights blazed and men swarmed in the streets. Here shadowy trees leaned over the water. Jason felt the sandy bottom under his feet, stood up and began to wade toward shore. The beach shelved rapidly and he came to dry sand. He flung himself down under a protecting bush so as to be hidden from sight. He lay there, panting, resting for the ordeal which was to come. The day of Lila's wedding had dragged past and night had come at last. Laura Webb moved about her house, pacing from room to room, her mind turning over and over the possible ways to help the girl. She had little hope of rescuing Jason from prison, but if she could delay the wedding of the princess—for a few days at least—something might be done.

But how to accomplish this without angering the king and bringing the royal wrath down on Jason. She came to the doctor's office and gazed absently at the big medicine chest in the corner. The lock was off and the lid was open. And suddenly she had an idea. She crossed swiftly to the chest and took out three bottles of rum, the same rum which Jason Blake had brought as a gift to the premier.

Hurriedly wrapping the three bottles in an old copy of "The Friend," the missionary newspaper to which the doctor subscribed, she hid the bundle under her cloak and left the house.

Laura made her way to the palace, and was told by the chamberlain that the king had retired to his private quarters to enjoy a light supper before the ceremonies began. She had little difficulty in gaining the presence of the king.

His Majesty was seated at a table when Laura entered. His collar was unbuttoned and he had laid aside his three-cornered hat. At the moment he was enjoying a dish of lomi lomi fish, raw salmon, pounded with onions and various herbs into a juicy and delectable mass. The king was old-fashioned and ate with his fingers, occasionally stopping to wash his hands in a large kua-wood bowl which stood beside the table. He looked up, saw Laura, then filled his mouth with fish. He was not pleased to see the wife of the ex-premier. He disliked interviews with women, anyway.

In order to forestall anything Laura might say, the king spoke first. "No time now. The wedding comes soon. Come and see me tomorrow."

"Your Majesty," Laura smiled gracefully. "I have brought you a gift. It comes from the medicine chest of Doctor Webb."

"Eh?" said the king. "What kind of a gift?"
 Laura extended the package. The king took it, shook it and heard it gurgle pleasantly. "What's this? What's this?" he chuckled.

"Three bottles of very fine Jamaica rum," Laura told him. "Presented to the doctor some time ago. I thought you might like them."

"Rum?" cried the king, his eyes lighting with pleasure. Unwrapping the package, he picked up one of the brown bottles and held it to the light of a lamp. "Jamaica rum? Just the thing. I use it to celebrate the wedding. What is a wedding if there is not a little something to wet the throat?" He looked around hurriedly and frowned. "Where's the chamberlain?"

Mrs. Webb went hurriedly to the door and beckoned. The chamberlain came at a trot. He produced a corkscrew with a flourish and corked the cork of one of the bottles.

The king poured himself a generous drink in a water tumbler. He sniffed the liquor with delight. "Smell good."

He tilted the glass and drank off the rum in one long gurgling swig. When he put it down he smacked his lips with pleasure and wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. "Good!" he exclaimed appreciatively. "Excellent! Been long time since I drink rum like this. Sit down," he invited as he looked at her. "So Doctor Webb send me present, eh? He change now that he no longer premier. I'll drink what I like now. He no my personal physician any longer."

Eku, who had been hovering anxiously in the background, now approached the king. "Your Majesty," he spoke timidly. "It is time to dress. You had better go to the robe room for your cloak and helmet."

"Of course, of course," grumbled the king irritably. "No hurry, I just have another sample of rum before I go. Don't bother me now! Can't you see I'm busy?"
