and strong, and suddenly she felt tempted to relax against it, to let him kiss her, to say "Yes" and forget this tired ache in his pleasure. But he was looking into her eyes, not attempting to kiss her.

"But love, Douglas," she said numbly. "I hadn't thought about it. You've only known me three weeks. Don't put me on a pedestal, because I'm very human."

"Darling! Wonderfully, delightfully human!" They laughed together. He went on:

"This isn't a boy's dream-in-fantasy, Cherry. I love you. I want you to live at Weston Park and grow to love it, and perhaps to love me a little, and—"

"And bear your sons," she said in an odd voice.

"And bear my sons," he agreed, searching her eyes. "I would be very proud of any son of yours, Cherry. My dear, you mustn't cry!"

"I'm not crying!" He lifted the sparkling drops off her eyelashes with his finger, smiling, and kissed the top of her downy head. "I'm sorry, darling. I'm a clumsy, selfish old fool. I ought to have known I'm thirty years too old for you."

"You're not!" she cried fiercely, using the handkerchief he passed her. "You're perfectly sweet to me, and I'm the fool. You're offering me everything that is wonderful, and I can't—I can't!"

"There isn't anyone else, is there?"

She squared her shoulders and lifted her head proudly. "No one, I'm quite free. But Douglas—oh, I like you so much! Do we have to think about anything else?"

He smiled at the childishness of her cry. "I'm quite unscrupulous, Cherry. I want you. I know you like me. I didn't expect you to be wildly in love with me. But I think you're very well balanced and wise and sensible for your generation. And against the glamor of young love I can offer you my affection and a certain position in life, and security, and a lovely old home."

"Please," she stopped him with a gesture. "Douglas, I know all that."

"I want you to think about it, Cherry. Don't say 'No' tonight." He laughed gently. "Let me keep my new dream for a few weeks more. But I had to tell you what I feel. I want you to know. I shall love and cherish you as long as I live, my little one." He stood up and touched her head again, pale in the moonlight, and added in a stifled voice. "And it isn't only a matter of an heir for Weston Park, darling."

"But now we'd better drive back to the ship, or we'll miss her. We sail at dawn!"
