...easily happen. The glasses are alike. "What about the medicine bottle?" Very carefully Brenda answered this question.

"All of Mr. Blair's medicine bottles are alike. His medicine always comes in bottles that never vary—one is exactly like another. Before I left the apartment, I straightened up the bathroom. I remember picking up a medicine bottle and putting it back in the cabinet. I assure you I did not notice at the time whether it was full or empty and I do not know now. I was not thinking of medicine or fingerprints at that particular moment."

As Donohue made no motion to stop her, she continued in a low, even voice. "Naturally my fingerprints would be on that bottle just as they are probably on every bottle in this apartment. I should think it would be a cause of much more concern to you if I had carefully wiped all fingerprints off that bottle, Lieutenant."

Her voice and her composure challenged him. There was a sardonic gleam in Donohue's eyes as he swiftly acknowledged her statement—a tinge of admiration in his voice.

"And that is fast thinking on your part, Mrs. Blair. Very disarming, too." But there was a decided note of triumph in his next statement.

"If you took a drink from the same glass your husband used later, both of your fingerprints would be found at the base of the glass and his would be above them, near the rim. That is the way we found the glass, Mrs. Blair."

He waited significantly, and a tense silence settled into a peculiarly long drawn out pause. Then Donohue said slowly:

Chapter 27 "Listen, Brenda," Christopher concluded in a low, tense voice, "Donohue will be here any minute—when he questions you, be very careful. He won't tell you, but anything you say now, he'll use against you later if he can..."

Brenda nodded. She was trying to hold on to herself. They heard the elevator stop. A gate clanged, and a minute passed before the door bell started ringing.

"How did Francine know?" Brenda whispered as they heard Hannah in the hall opening the door.

"God knows. There's something screwy about that," Christopher muttered as he walked away from Brenda toward a window on the opposite side of the room. "But we'll soon find out. Take it easy, Brenda."

The next instant Lieutenant Donohue was in the room and the situation turned at once into an official investigation. He did not seem surprised to see Christopher.

"Well, Mrs. Blair," he began in his usual abrupt manner, "I see you already know the result of the autopsy this afternoon."

"Yes," Brenda said quietly, but her heart was turning and jumping in a queer way as she sat down on the sofa facing the police officer.

"It will be necessary for me to get another set of your fingerprints," Brenda was growling used to his staccato observations. Silently she complied with his request.

He spread the prints before him on a table and took from a briefcase another set of fingerprints. He carefully examined both sets under a thick magnifying glass for several minutes. Then he leaned back in his chair and when he spoke his voice was ominous.

"Mrs. Blair, this is hard to believe. I find your fingerprints on the drinking glass that contained the dose of nitroglycerine that killed your husband."

If he had thought to frighten or stampede her into a statement by such a remark, he was immediately disappointed. Brenda had control of herself now. She said nothing—only looked at him and waited.

But Christopher, on the far side of the room, could feel the sharp edge of fear that struck back at her as Donohue showed the direction his investigation would take. The lieutenant cleared his throat noisily and continued in a harsh voice.

"Your fingerprints are also on the medicine bottle your maid brought him at his request a couple of hours before he died."
