mid—mother knows best—than anything else. I'm not trained to care for a child. But I am trained to do commercial art work.

"It's a novel idea, anyway. Most women—"

"Are afraid to admit it," Penny cut in swiftly. "Jim would not think of giving up his work. Why should I? Just because a woman has a baby doesn't mean that she must cut herself off from all that she loves to do—and can do well—and bury herself with a child. It is perfectly logical to assume that she can do both without either interfering with the other. It has been proven too many times to argue about.

"There might be compensations, Penny. Jim would have to shoulder his full share and it might be good for him. And looking after a home—children—well, I came back to tell you—"

Trudy paused, as if choosing her next words carefully.

She was, Penny admitted, an exceptional mother-in-law. As soon as Jim married, Trudy had left her home and had gone traveling and visiting people that she had known for years, quite as if she had been afraid that she might interfere with their marriage. That's why she had stayed in Chicago so long. Never by word or gesture had Trudy implied that this cooperative marriage might not be the best possible arrangement for those concerned. It was as if she wanted it to work out, absolutely without her.

The two women sat motionless, as if caught by the fog that blew in from the lake. Through that fog Penny heard Jim's angry words, "Have you no feelings? No natural instincts? Do you really want to turn your child over to nurses?"

Suddenly, Penny saw her way out. She leaned forward eagerly. "You come and live with us. Trudy will you? Until the baby is old enough for nursery school? Please, Trudy! Surely a grandmother's arms are as good as a mother's."

Part-Time MOTHER

By DAVID TAYLOR MARKE

Yesterday, Penny Martin, rushing to finish her final art for Milady Perfumes, is interrupted by the unexpected arrival of her mother-in-law, Trudy Martin. Trudy is delighted to find that Penny is about to become a mother—her first grandchild. But Penny, rebelliously, reveals that Jim, her husband, doesn't want her to give up her career to care for the baby. She won't do it, she cries. Jim had agreed that she could retain her independent career after they were married and she intended to do so—despite the baby!

Chapter 2

She jerked wrapping paper around the finished art, her mind so much in a tumult that she could scarcely control the movements of her fingers as they tied the string. Then she rang for a delivery boy. She thought it the worst piece of work she'd turned out in years. She was going to seed. She swallowed hard, fighting weak tears.

Trudy counted stitches and said, "I had a wonderful time in Buenos Aires. I arrived at the height of the season and was overjoyed to find so many of my friends there. Met some nice people, too."

"So you wrote," Penny fingered the drape at the window and felt rebuked. The echoes of the quarrel at breakfast seemed to linger in the room. "Don't you dare encourage Jim, Trudy. I couldn't stand it to have the two of you against me. We've got to work this out sensibly. I know, but I'm not going to give up everything that I've worked so hard to achieve."

Trudy chuckled. "You remind me of two wildcats fighting to see who is going to be boss of the den. You're furious, aren't you, because you are going to have this baby? Or it is because Jim has reacted to that fact in the usual manner? No matter how superior-appearing he might be, most men do, you know."

"Both, I guess. And then this Milady Perfumes job having to come at just this time."

"Does that mean so much?"

"Everything. Jim would have liked a chance at it. He was disappointed when Rutter's asked me for my stuff."

"It seems to me that he's always been generous about your successes, Penny."

"I know. But before that, he understood perfectly and agreed with me about the baby. We bought a house in the suburbs, and we've been living there three months. Then this chance came along and I moved back into the city so that I could get the picture finished. That's when Jim said it wouldn't work."

Trudy parried three, knit two and parried three again. "And will it?"

"Certainly. I know a fine nurse who would be willing to take complete charge of the baby. I could come into the studio every day and pay the extra expense myself. But now Jim's got some silly notion that a baby needs its mother's arms."

"But—doesn't it?"

"I can't even remember my father and mother, and I haven't suffered because of it. A trained nurse can take better care of any baby than that child's mother."

Trudy made a quick gesture of protest.

"Oh, read the books, Trudy! More harm is done by that bro-
