Chapter 20

Tom Winslow had never been a man who talked a great deal, but tonight he was so glad to see his daughter that he kept up a running fire of chatter all the way out to the farm.

"Your mother and I have been hoping you'd come soon," he said, his big brown hands deftly maneuvering the car around a curve. "It's pretty lonesome with you and Frances and Tommy all gone. Remember the lively times we had when you were all at home?"

"Indeed I do — every one of them. And I would come oftener, but you know how scarce help is and Mr. Farham really needs me."

"Yes, I know. It's really a problem getting help on the farm. Your mother even wanted to work in the fields but that is something I will not permit. She's got enough to do in the house."

"Mother's well, isn't she?"

"Yes, but sometimes, Anne, I see a look about her that bothers me. It's worry about what'll happen to Tommy now, I guess. I tell her that if he would come through Saipan without a scratch he'll make his way back home. If the worst comes to the worst, he can always work on the farm."

"I had a letter from Tommy just the other day," Anne said. "He writes the craziest things. Do you have any idea where he is now?"

"No, that's what worries us, but I guess he'll be restless for a while longer — but he'll settle down again."

They reached the wide, wing-spreading old country house with its vines over the gables and doves up under the eaves. Within these walls were bound up all the happy memories of childhood and young girlhood. Here she knew she could always find sanctuary from any troubles that might befall her.

Her mother was waiting on the porch to wrap Anne warmly in a fervent embrace. "I was so afraid you wouldn't come, Anne! I've saved your supper. You haven't had any, have you?"

"No, and I'm starving!" Anne knew that was what her mother was hoping she would say. She was the kind of woman who delighted in feeding people and her fame as a cook was widespread. Now she led the way into the big, old-fashioned kitchen, modernized now with electric lights, running water and inlaid linoleum. Anne exclaimed over a new washing machine in the corner.

"Mother! How wonderful for you! Why, you'll be getting downright lazy with all these conveniences!"

Her mother sniffed. "Taking care of these things uses up about as much time as doing the work the hard way!" she retorted, but Anne knew she was bursting with pride over her new possessions.

Jessie Winslow set out cold chicken, home-made bread, milk that was half cream and apple pie with a big blob of whipped cream on it.

"Heavens!" Anne exclaimed, reaching for the food with relish.

Her mother's eyes had lighted on the ring on Anne's finger. "Anne!" she cried excitedly, "What's this?"

"Well, I . . . "

"Tom, come here quick! Something's happened to Anne."

Her father came in quickly from putting away the car, his face showing alarm at his wife's words. Anne laughed. "There's nothing the matter, father. But sit down and I'll tell you both all about it."

And she told them all about Wayne. When she had finished her father said, "All we want to be sure of, Anne, is your happiness. If you think this boy can give it to you, that's all we ask."

"I'm sure he can, father."

"Why didn't you bring him up before he left?" her mother wanted to know. "We would have liked to get acquainted with him at least."

"Wayne is just about as easy to tie down to anything definite as Tommy is," Anne answered. "You know how that is—and there was so little time after we decided we loved each other."

A shadow crossed Mrs. Winslow's face at mention of Tommy, but she said quietly, "And you didn't even write us about it."

"I knew I was coming home soon and thought it would be much better to tell it in person."

"Then when will the wedding be?" her father asked. "You've got to at least give me enough notice so I can get a new shirt and tie."

"I'm not exactly sure when Wayne can get leave," Anne explained, "but I'll guarantee not to make a move without letting you know. You know perfectly well I wouldn't think of getting married without you two being there!"

Later when Anne was upstairs in the room she and Frances had shared through their girlhood, it was almost like she had never been away. She thought of all the times she had stood before the dressing table there and dressed to go to parties. She remembered some of the boys who had escorted her. She supposed most of them were in the service now. How many times she had thought herself to be in love and had thrilled with expectancy in this very room, trembling for fear that the adored one would not find her attractive. She smiled in remembrance.

"Is anything real, after all?" she wondered. "Is anything permanent? Or will life as I know it now one day seem as vague and dim as those other days do now? Isn't there anything to really tie on to?"

She remembered, then, her father's steadiness, his strong hands on the wheel of the car. Her mother's bravery, using a fine display of interest in her new appliances to mask the worry in her heart over her son's future. She thought of her mother and father's quiet dependence on each other throughout the years, their devotion to the making of a home. Into her mind, too, came a vision of Catherine Lowell, whose gaiety covered the tortures of her illness; of Eve, making a new life for herself out of the ashes of the old one.

"Those are the people who will keep this old world steady," she thought, and drifting off into slumber she thought of the three laughing sailors on the bus — and of Wayne and her love for him — and inevitably of John Lowell and the turmoil he had aroused in her heart. But the whispering leaves of the old beech tree outside her window were a soothing potion that merged all these thoughts into dimness and lifted her into the world of sleep.
