DARK POWER

BY ELISABETH HOLDING

Chapter 21

She had come to this decision rapidly, but quite deliberately. "No one there would do me any real harm," she thought. "They can't afford to, because they're hoping to get Uncle Rufus' money through me. I've got to go back and find out what's happened to Mr. Fennel."

She was perfectly sure that something had happened to Fennel, and that Miles was responsible for it; she was profoundly alarmed and troubled, yet in her heart there was still that unshakable confidence in Fennel.

Her chief motive was loyalty. Fennel had come entirely on her account; any misadventure that had befallen him was due to his wish to help her. And now she would help him.

"I can't very well go to the police," she thought. "I haven't any evidence that anything's happened. And Aunt Emma would know how to make things look all right. She called in that detective herself. I wish I'd kept that other letter—the one with the money in it. It was a forgery, of course. Who did it? Miles? Is that what he's so worried about?"

"If anyone had ever cared for him," she thought, "had ever taken any trouble over him, he might have been a decent man."

Light was shining from the windows of the lounge. But all the other dark rooms . . . "I have the upper hand!" she said to herself. "Perhaps I'm the only person who can find out what happened to Mr. Fennel. Perhaps they've done something—horrible . . ."

It was very hard to believe that, when she stood again in the shadow of that house. "Uncle Rufus," she thought, with a shock. "I promised not to leave him!"

She stopped outside the door, appalled. How was it possible that she had forgotten that? For a moment despair seized her. Then she began to think sanely and lucidly.

"I'll stand by him. I won't desert him. But I will not—I cannot live in that house. I must see him and explain it. There must be some sort of hotel in the village. I'll stay there, and come to see him every day until he's well enough to leave. I'll beg him to insist upon having a nurse for the night. I'll do it all quite openly."

She glanced back at the cab that stood square and solid in the driveway, its light shining out clearly. Then she opened the door and entered the lounge. "Ah!" said a bland voice, and Mr. Purvis rose from his chair. "Miss Diana . . . We've been waiting for you!"
