ing a winch used for hoisting brown eyes turned up to her alcargoes from dories. The wheel, badly in need of oiling turned now with a rasping shriek that vied with the penetrating cries of seagulls overhead.

It was a gray day. The ocean rolled in in sullen leaden swells, slapping against the pilings and not breaking until they were almost on the beach. As Pam looked toward the end of the pier and saw the winch lift a sodden inert bundle onto the warped planking she knew this was a scene she would always remember. Brent's fingers tightened on her arm. His face was grim.

"Think you can go through with this, Pam?"

She shot him a quick rueful cargoes turned up to her almost sheepishly.

"Sorry to have upset you ma's the would identify hir rell me now, where did you say the wound was?"

Pam shut be eyes, seeing again the corpse in the tower room.

"I don't think I said definitely, Constable, but the man was lying face up and there was a bigning face up and there was a supposed someone had struck him from behind."

But when the group parted for her and she gazed down at the dead man lying in widening pool of sea water, she wasn't so sure. The pier lurched sickeningly; she shut her eyes and swallowed hard.

breaths. So still was it that ex-cept for the seagull's cries, the strain and creak of the pier in the tide and the water from the dead man's clothes seeping through the cracks and drip-ping into the ocean below, there was no sound, Pam bent lower and opened her eyes.... Three days of being battered by relentless seas had done their work. Pam's glance crept from the scuffed shoes up the wet twisted serge trousers, over the torn blue shirt and pea jacket to the pasty bruised face with the blurred sightless eyes. Even in prolonged death there was a cruel uplifted sneer to the rigid mouth. She nodded quickly.

"It's the same man." Then she crossed to the side of the pier and gave up the so re-cently enjoyed chocolate soda. When Pam emerged from the wave of nausea that had swept over her she realized that a jacket had been put across her shoulders and that a worn cool hand was holding her forehead.

Chapter 18

A stunned silence filled the little drug store. Conversation died as though a switch had been turned culting it off. All eyes were centered on the small barefooted boy who stood in front of Pam Carter.

Sensing the effect of his startling announcement he began to swagger a bit. He tucked his grubby thumbs in his overall suspenders and seratched the back of one leg with the foot of the other.

"I said Constable Binny wants you. ." he repeated.
Pam nodded and slid off her stool. "I heard you, son."
Brent, who had been buying adhesive plaster, crossed to take her elbow and together they left the store, the small boy strutting importantly before them.
"Binny is not exactly the soul of discretion, is he?" Pam observed.
"Hardly. Unless for some reason he wanted it made public. I suppose in a village like cover Point there's no such thing a secret."
"Well, it looks like the whole town is in on this."

"Well, it looks like the whole town is in on this."

"Pam gestured toward the end of the dock. Most of the workers had come out of the sardine factory and were guthered in a knot. Two men were working a winch used for hoisting cargoes from dories. The wheel, badly in need of oiling, turned now with a rasping shrick that many times over. We never grow used to it but we're always grateful when it's someone we don't know."

The cool gray eyes looked seathers of women who had libe ward and Pam Knew she was staring at the descendant of generations of women who had watched a fishing fleet depart to the Grand Banks with a prayer knowing in their hearts that some one among those men would not return.

Another woman arrived with a pat of steaming coffee and women," she said a bit shortly. He grinned "Binny was determined to talk to me and he wants to speak to you some more."

Pam's stomach seemed to turn over. "Oh Brent, I couldn't face that sight again. It's just too much."

"Don't worry, he's under can-voer. "Oh Brent, I couldn't face that sight again. It's just too much."

She shot him a quick rueful little smile. "I sort of have to, don't I, pet" Don't worry, can do."

The jacket was Brent's but the hand belonged to one of the women cannery workers. Her calm gray eyes met Pam's sympathetically.
