Dallas Water Supply Limited

Dallas — With the large number of persons using city water a bad fire in the city might turn into a disaster because of the limited reservoir capacity, according to E. L. McCleary, manager of the Dallas water commission.

The manager this week issued a statement saying that it is time that Dallas residents started thinking of building a new reservoir.

Water pressure drops to 65 pounds in the daytime, even in the winter months when no demands for sprinkling and irrigation are made. With normal use by the 1681 water customers three fire hoses running continuously could drain the two small present reservoirs in about five or six hours, McCleary said.

A new reservoir would allow the system to hold water that ordinarily runs out of the overflowing reservoirs during the night when demand is not so heavy.

The greater capacity would be reflected in lower fire insurance rates in the city.
