Peddler of Dreams By PEGGY DERN

Garrett studied her with sharpened interest.

"You mean I'll have to haunt the back roads and all that?" he saked.

"Naturally — if you expect to make anything from your idea."

"He shrugged. "Well, maybe it wasn't such a hot idea, after all."
"But it was a such a lot idea, after all."

"But it was a such a lot idea, after all." "But it was—and is!" protested relicity, "Why — it's wonderfui! You're—you're a peddler of dreams sort of."

sort of."

Garrett was studying her with more interest. "Tell you what I'll do—I'll give you half interest if you'll help me carry out the idea." Felicity caught her breath. "But that hardly sounds fair," she protested. "Frankly, we have Just money enough to get us to Florida and run us for about a month—so we couldn't put a penny into buying an interest—""Tye just told you I don't want ing an interest—"

"I've just told you I don't want any money from you." Garrett cut in eagerly. "Look I may as well break down and confess that the whole plan is pretty much a washout. I'm not used to the country. I'm not used to being alone—I get as lonely as the devil—I almost wept on the kids' shoulders when they blew in tonight.

Felicity looked at Jason, hesitant. And before she could answer, Garrett added, "Of course, you'd have to get your dad and mother to agree to shift your route. Maybe they wouldn't like it—"
"Our mother is dead." Felicity

Ing atone?"

Pelicity's head went up and her brown eyes chilled just a little. The scarcely a child, Mr. Forbes," also told him curely, "I'll be twenty-three on Christmas Eve. Jay's almost sixteen. Even Ellen, the baby

"Helio," said the young man, and gravely shook hands with Jason. "Tim Garrett Forbes. How do you do, Miss Horne?"

"I found the kids in Mr. Forbes trafler," Jason explained.

"I thought they were swell," said Garrett, He held out a batch of magazines and said. "The one that jooks like a talking French dollord, but she's a little beauty!—seemed to yearn to cut paper-dolls. And I don't imagine my customers—if any-will miss a few faahlon magazines of two years ago, so I brought these along."

"It's very kind of you. Tippy will be enchanted," said Felicity, and took the magazines. "They came home raving sbout a man who had a million books and magazines in his trafler."

"And of course you wondered what was the big idea," said Garrett, Just think of us as Felicity, and took the magazines. "They came home raving sbout a man who had a million books and magazines in his trafler."

"And of course you wondered what was the big idea," said Garrett, Just think of us as Felicity, and took the magazines to farmer-folk for whatever they had they didn't need—farm products and the like; and then, at the next town, sell the produce for whatever it would bring."

"Well, the idea was to trade the books and magazines to farmer-folk for whatever they had they didn't need—farm products and the like; and then, at the next town, sell the produce for whatever it would bring."

"Why—what a perfectly swell idea!" Felicity exclaimed.

Garrett chuckled. "So I thought when I left New York—but you'd be amazed how uninterested the farmer-folk are. It seems most of 'em have a book."

"Of course, Why?"

"Living along the main high-way, with buses and cars going into town—with the dairymen's as sociations and things like that buy-ting up their stuff, naturally they wouldn't be interested just in 'barter."

"Garrett studied her with sharpened interest.

"You mean I'll have to haunt the back roads and all that?" he aked

Garret stood up and held out his hand, grinning down at her. "Then it's agreed! That's swell! This is going to be fun. We'll settle the de-tails in the morning. Good-night." (To Be Continued)
