'The Red Shoe' Reaches Perfection Level in Films

Art in motion pictures at perfection level might best describe the breath-taking production of "The Red Shoes," which will open in Salem next Sunday, May 15, in a roadshow presentation at the State theater.

"The most beautiful thing I ever saw" were the exact words of four persons in succession as they left the special preview shown Wednesday afternoon. The film was awarded three of the "oscar" of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences recently—for best production in color, best musical score and best art direction—and for this writer's money should have won all the other "oscar" possible to bestow upon it.

It is the first picture ever to present a full-length ballet in its entirety and all exterior were filmed on actual localities—London, Paris, Monte Carlo, Nice, Cannes, the Maritime Alps—and with that list of locales all done in technicolor, you can know the result—an extravaganza meriting all the "supers" you can attach to it.

In addition to the gorgeous colors, elaborate settings and many striking effects, there is beautiful music, a show in itself aside from the picture.

Theme of the ballet shown in the picture is "The Red Shoes," based on a fairy tale by Hans Christian Andersen—the little red shoes that never grew tired. Even though the dancer was exhausted and wanted to go home, the little red shoes danced on, taking the dancer through a multitude of scenes that allow the technicolor screen presentation of the ballet every opportunity for color and beauty.

Even around the theme is the drama within the company presenting the ballet, the story of a girl who wanted to become a great dancer, the stern taskmaster who pointed out the sacrifices the composer with whom the girl falls in love and marries the final choice between career and marriage and the tragedy—with the little red shoes a part of the dramatic conclusion.

Overshadowing the movie's story, however, is the magnificent presentation of the ballet.

Many outstanding names in theater, music and the ballet are in the cast. Moira Shearer, 22-year old prima ballerina of the Covent Garden Opera ballet, makes her film debut as the dancer in "The Red Shoes." Marius Goring of stage and film name has the role of the composer while Anton Walbrook, who has had a distinguished stage career, has the role of the impresario. Many other dancers of ballet fame appear in the show.
