

Peddler of Dreams

By PEGGY DERN

(Chapter 8)
The trailer camp loomed ahead. A grassy spot, marked by half a dozen trailers parked chummy close, shaded by a feathery-leaved tree. Australian pines with the blue shimmer of the lake visible through the trees.

Felicity blew her horn.

There was a weatherbeaten small cabin at the far end of the camp. As Felicity's horn broke the noonday stillness, a screen door slapped somewhere and a plump-middle-aged woman with graying hair done in a loose knot on the back of her head, her clean print dress covered by a white apron, came towards her. Felicity liked "Ma" Green at sight. Her gray eyes were twinkling and cheerful; her plump face was highly colored, guileless alike of makeup or wrinkles.

"Howdy," she greeted Felicity cheerfully. "Like to stay awhile?"

"Yes, we would—very much," said Felicity warmly, radiating twice as much after the frigid reception they had had on the other side of the lake. "But—I have some children. Do you mind?"

"Do I mind? Not if you don't. After all, they're your young ones," said Ma Green comfortably, looking more sharply at Felicity. "But land sakes, girl, you look mighty young to have a bunch of kids."

"They're my brothers and sisters," Felicity answered her. "And we'd like to stay all winter."

"Well, now, that's just fine. If you're going to be sort of permanent, you'd better have a 'hitch' down near me, where you won't be disturbed by the coming and going of the transients."

Mr Green showed Felicity to a parking space down at the farthermost end of the camp, where the trailer stood broadside to a glorious view of the lake.

Neither Felicity nor Garrett was aware of Tippy's slowness in leaving Garrett's trailer, nor of her uneasiness that sent her back and forth then to peer in at the window.

They were all about the table. Tippy the last one in and insisting on a seat nearest the door, and they were just beginning the meal when suddenly the music of the next-door radio broke off and they heard a man's excited voice, saying:

"We interrupt this program to bring you a news-flash. Allan, the year-old son of Susan Fleming, often mentioned as 'the richest girl in the world' has been kidnapped from the beach in front of the Fleming home. Every bridge and boat-dock leaving the island of Palm Beach is under heavy guard—"

There was a small crash. Felicity turned and saw Tippy sitting white-faced, a splash of milk on his face, the broken glass in her palm. Tippy's eyes were wide with terror and she was shaking violently. "I betcha I've got Mrs. Fleming's baby," she confessed, now in such terror that she had no longer and thought of concealing the reason for her earlier uneasiness.

"Tippy—tell me—what did you do?" demanded Felicity.

Tippy slid down from her chair and pattered out of the trailer, Garrett and Felicity following her, the other children crowding behind. Tippy opened the door of Garrett's trailer and climbed in, the others following her. And there on Garrett's bed, hemmed neatly in by pillows, lay a sleeping baby. His scrap of a white sun-stippled plump golden-brown limbs and an adorable head covered with little "duck-tails" of soft dark curls.

Tippy looked at the baby and then fearfully up at a horrified Felicity; and Tippy whimpered: "I'm—sorry, Miss. Only he was so cute — and — and he wanted to come with us. I didn't know he was somebody else's baby. I thought maybe he'd like to live with us—"

"Oh, Garry—Garry, what am I going to do?" whispered Felicity so desolately that Garrett pulled himself together with an effort.

"Your English needs correcting, my angel," he told her grimly. "You mean what are we going to do."

Garrett said sternly, "Here—snatch out of it, Fliss. Pull yourself together. We have to work fast. Before the alarm spreads very far. Jay take the children back to the trailer and give them their lunch and ride herd on them until we come back. Promise not to let one of them out of your sight for so much as five minutes, will you, old man?"

"Okay, Garry. Come on kids," said Jason, herding the children before him.

Tippy, trying to slide out unnoticed, caught Garrett's stern eye and paused uneasily. "You're coming, too, my lady," said Garrett. "So you can tell Mrs. Fleming all about why you thought her baby would like living with the Hornes."

"Yes, sir," said Tippy faintly, too scared to do anything but obey, and far too terrified to think of exerting any of her small charm on this irate young man in the hope of escaping punishment.

The guards at the bridges were stopping and searching all cars coming from the island. The alarm was so newly sounded that they had not yet organized themselves to stop any cars going to the island.
