

Peddler of Dreams

By PEGGY DERN

(CHAPTER 12)
A few days after Thanksgiving, Ma Green's Trailer Camp had a surprise visitor. It was Susan Fleming.

Felicity was busy giving the trailer a thorough cleaning. "I would be!" she wailed hollowly to herself as Susan stood on the bottom step looking at her curiously.

"Forgive me for dropping in like this. But I knew you hadn't come to the beach and—well, I wanted you too. So I came over to invite you especially."

"That's awfully nice of you," said Felicity, and felt a little less uncomfortable, because of Susan's manner-of-face manner. "But we've found a place up north of Jupiter that's not private, and nobody seems to mind our using it—"

Susan's face flushed a little, and she said swiftly, "But you mustn't let the children go swimming just anywhere along the coast. There are places that are unsafe. My beach is always patrolled and the two new bodyguards I've hired for the baby are excellent swimmers and bodyguards. The children must learn to swim, and since Larry is a bit too young to keep them busy—why don't you let them teach your youngsters?"

"Thank you, but I couldn't think of being such a bother—"

Susan put out a beautifully kept hand, on one finger of which a star sapphire caught the sunshine and held it in a shimmering way. "I know my butler was insolent that day, and I'm terribly sorry—but that exquisite child of yours who walked away with my baby seemed a very interesting person, and I'm anxious to know the rest of you. Please come over tomorrow afternoon and we'll have a picnic on the beach—please?"

"But—you must be awfully busy."

Susan was slightly amused. "I'm a lonely, bored, restless creature, and it would be an act of Christian charity, no less, if you would bring the children—and that very nice young man of yours—and come over tomorrow afternoon! Now, be a good child and say you will."

Felicity could think of no more objections and, to her own surprise, found she really didn't want to offer any more. She yielded as gracefully as she could. Susan smiled and looked herself over.

Garrett came over, his hair tousled, his shirt collar open at the throat, straight from his morning's work.

"That looked like Susan Fleming," he said as he lounged in the doorway and studied Felicity.

"It was none other," she assured him. "Come to invite us all to a picnic or her private beach beside her private ocean tomorrow afternoon. She wants her son's bodyguards to teach the children how to swim."

"Does she, now?" Garrett was amused, impressed.

"And you're invited, too," Felicity said, and told herself privately she was a fool to feel a very small tinge of jealousy at the memory of the way Susan had said "that very nice young man of yours."

Garrett looked startled.

"Well, why on earth could she want me? I can swim by myself," he protested.

"I wouldn't know, only she invited you especially," said Felicity firmly. "Of course, I didn't tell her you were working—"

"Perish the thought," protested Garrett pliously and promptly. "I wouldn't mix it for the world. A chance to see how the other half lives—only the Fleming set wouldn't be half, would it. There can't be more than half a dozen women in the world with as much money as Susan Fleming has."

Felicity nodded and looked grave.

"Somehow, it doesn't look like such an awful lot of fun, though—having that much money—does it?" She spoke straight from her heart.

lucky man a very swell wife some day, Fliss, my gal," he assured her. Suddenly he didn't feel amused any more. The thought of Felicity as another man's wife wasn't amusing at all. He definitely didn't like it.

"I'm never going to marry," Felicity said, without meeting his eyes.

"What—never?"

She looked up at him steadily and her soft mouth was grave. "How can I?" she asked levelly. "With the youngsters to look after?"

Garrett definitely didn't like that, either.

"Oh, now see here, Fliss, you can't go on sacrificing yourself for the children all your life. You'd make a perfectly swell wife and mother. A girl like you should get married—" he heard himself protesting sharply.

"He'd have to be a pretty swell man to want to take over the children along with me. And unless he was willing, I wouldn't marry him—so—you see?"

Garrett stared at her, frowning, obscurely angry, yet not quite sure just what attitude he should take to reveal to her the way he felt.

Felicity ended the moment by saying swiftly, "You'd better run along now, Garry, and get your heroine out of the clutches of the villain. I've got a lot of work to do before the children come home to lunch."

And Garrett, feeling as though he had been saved from some very foolish step, yet not at all sure that he wanted to be saved, took himself off.
