What does Prudential mean to families of the West?

Last year when the Prudential announced the establishment of a Western Home Office in Los Angeles—to control all the company's operations in the eleven western states—many families of the West wondered just what this move meant to them.

Opening of the Western Home Office was the first step in placing the management and control of the company's western business in the hands of men living in the West. The Prudential felt that such a policy of decentralization would have the effect of extending Prudential services to more people and of making more money available for the continued development and advancement of this great western area.

Already we have tangible evidence that these expectations are being rapidly fulfilled.

Let's look at housing, for example—one of today's most significant problems. During 1948 the Prudential helped residents of the eleven western states finance more homes than in any previous year. In fact, the total amount of money borrowed from the company for this purpose increased 73% during that period.

Today, more than 55,000 families in this Western region have the security of a home through the help of a Prudential loan.

The Prudential is a service organization designed to protect the individual, the family and the community through life insurance. For nearly seventy-five years it has served people who needed and wanted its services. There is a representative of the new Western Home Office in your community. We suggest you discuss your insurance needs and program with him today.

IN OREGON

The dollar amount of city loans at the close of 1948 was in excess of $12,600,000. Eighty-four percent of these were to finance dwelling units while the remainder were for industrial and commercial development.
