Anti-Bomb Test 'Too Realistic'

London, June 28 (AP)—The first phase of air exercises to test the defense of industrial England against an atom bomb blitz ended today with one major complaint. London residents said they were "too realistic."

Referees and high air officials of three countries were cagey about preliminary results of "operation foil" in which British bombers and fighters, American superforts and jet fighters, and Dutch jet fighters participated.

There were indications from other observers and from the sound of heavy bomber formations over the metropolitan area that England's capital had been "heavily pounded" in two night attacks.

"Operations foil" will continue for another week as fighter and bomber squadrons, reinforcement at weekend by reserve air formations of British pilots, test plans for protecting England in war. An air ministry spokesman said conclusions from the exercises will probably not be made public.

Thousands of aroused Britishers, their sleep broken on a hot June weekend by low-flying warplanes, telephoned the air ministry to complain. Many said their children, reminded of wartime blitz raids, ran screaming from their homes.

To these complaints an air ministry spokesman answered: "If we are to prepare an adequate defense our practices must be as real as we can make them."
