How Gals Ate in 1890s

New York (U.P.)—When Wellesley College for women was being built almost 75 years ago the workmen were forbidden to swear, talk loudly or fight, according to a book just published, "Wellesley, Part of the American Story," by Alice Payne Hackett (Dutton).

Founded in 1875 by Henry and Pauline Durant especially for training women teachers, the college was run by women from the president down. The only males employed were a baker, an engineer and a porter.

A sample Wellesley college menu of the 1890s indicates that the girls liked to eat.

For breakfast there was fruit, shredded wheat, chops, baked sweet potatoes, corn flakes, bread and coffee. Lunch consisted of cold roast beef, apple sauce, chocolate, biscuits and cake.

For dinner they had soup, roast beef, macaroni, mashed potatoes, green corn, pickled beets, celery, swash, pie and cheese.

The Wellesley News described the "dolled up" costume for campus wear in 1910 as white buckskin golf shoes, a long narrow white linen shirt, shirtwaist with long sleeves and a negligee ruffled collar; the whole toned down by a dash of color in the form of a violent green sash two feet wide. The costume was set off by the "society slouch" which gave a bored listlessness to one's posture.
