

Only the Brave

By PAUL EVAN LEHMAN

(Chapter 27)

Hank made a compact parcel of her purchases. She paid him and went out. Chuck was not in sight. The dim shape of the Town Hall stable loomed up on her left. She opened the building and went through the back door. A shadow appeared before her and Chuck's voice said, "Connie?"

"Yes."

"Go the stuff? Good. My horse is in the stall. Tie the bundle behind the saddle. Then stay right there. You hear me? If things don't go wrong, I'll be back here pretty soon with my Tyler. You still aim to keep your bargain?"

"Yes." Her voice caught, but she said it.

For the first time she heard him chuckle. "Said I always got what I wanted, didn't I?"

She didn't answer that. "What are you going to do?"

"Try my luck at throwin' stones."

Jeff sat on his bunk in the Town Hall Jail. There had been no visitors. Jeff was forced to the conclusion that Frothingham had not delivered his message to Glenn, and as he thought over his own precarious position, even his courageous nature came close to despair.

"If Glenn would only come! He could assure the boy that his secret was safe and have him change the shoes on his horse. Then he could tell about those tracks on the back of the barn, could prove to them that another was present and at least raise some doubt as to his own guilt.

When one got right down to the heart of the problem, it was plain to see that Sluz Benjamin held the key. Force the truth from Sluz and the pendulum of public opinion must swing abruptly the other way. But the search for Sluz would be neglected now, abandoned perhaps, because men thought that they had the culprit safe. Their sympathy would be with Sluz as a man who had borne the stigma of another's misdeeds.

He heard the grate of a key in the lock. Ed Wade came in, gun in hand, looked sharply at Jeff, then came over and tested the cell door. It rattled, but was securely locked. Ed let his gaze roam over the interior of the cell, then turned away.

Jeff said, "Did Bill get word to Glenn yet?"

"Bill's been right busy. There was a mob outside yellin' for your head and for a while it looked like they might get it."

"I've got to see Glenn. Ed, get word to him just as quick as you can."

"I'll tell Bill," promised Wade and went out.

He heard a little ping as a stone came through and he caught it before it could strike the floor. He drew in the string, turning his head and cocking his ears toward the door. He saw the something tied to it had caught against the bars. It was the blade of a hatchet.

Jeff kept hauling in the string, winding it about his hand as he did so. The other end was tied through the hole of a latrine. This he drew into the cell, clinging to it swiftly. Climbing up on the bunk, he went to work. There was no time to work cautiously; he had to get out of there before the mob returned. He saw through four
