

Born of the Storm

By SIDNEY B. CARTER

(Chapter 8)
Priscilla stared at the letter in her hand. The sudden rush of emotion at the sight of it left her weak and trembling. Perhaps Dennis was coming back. Why else would he send her a special delivery letter?

With shaking hands Priscilla all the envelope and took out the letter. It was very short.
"My dearest friend," it began. Priscilla's hopes sank. "Your father wrote me that your unhappiness and asked me whether I could not make some further explanation to you in regard to my decision to go away from Riverdale."
Oh, Dad, how could you do such a thing? I have some pride left. "Your father is worried about you and, indeed, after reading his letter, so am I. I assure you that I think more of you than of any other girl on this earth and if I have brought you unhappiness by my actions, I could not do otherwise. It was, and is, by belief that you are more unhappy than ever. This restless possessiveness more than ever."

Priscilla, blinded by tears, turned out the light and groped her way to the stairs.
Restless, restless, restless sighed the June breezes that night. Restless means no rest. No rest, no rest for Dennis. No rest for Priscilla.

At nine o'clock a stream of sunlight and the aching of her shoulder muscles brought her back to the world of reality.
When she opened her eyes, she saw Drusie standing beside the bed. "Mother says you'd better get up," Drusie informed her. "Mother says it's late."

Priscilla glanced at the little pink enamel clock on her dressing table. "It's only nine o'clock," she said. "Anyway, I was out late last night."
"I know, that's why Mother's mad," said Drusie. "Besides, you're wanted on the telephone."

It was Kenneth's voice Priscilla heard when she picked up the telephone in the downstairs hallway.
"Why, hello, Kenneth, how are you?"
"How are you?" Kenneth's tone was one of contribution. "That's more to the point!"

"I'm fine," lied Priscilla. Her shoulders were painfully stiff. "I never felt better in my life." There was no need to tell him otherwise.
Kenneth's voice was bright with relief. "I'm so glad," he said. "Then then how about a date tonight?"

"Sorry," said Priscilla. "You should have asked me sooner." That was true. She had promised Raymond a date tonight.
"Well, how about tomorrow night?"
"I have a date tomorrow night, too. That's the honest truth, Kenneth."

There was silence for a moment and then Kenneth spoke apologetically, his short spell of temper over. "Gee, Priscilla, when are you going to be my girl?"
"Not," said Priscilla, "until you get over being jealous."
"Well," said Kenneth, "could I have a date the night after the night after tonight?"

"Yes," said Priscilla, matching his elaborateness with her own. "Yes, I think that could be arranged. I also think it could be a lot of fun." She hung up the receiver, chuckling to herself.

"Priscilla Hayden," her mother called from the kitchen. "Just a minute! Did I hear you making a date for tonight with that stupid Kent person?"
"No, Mother," said Priscilla. "I have a date with Raymond."
"Well, that's better," said Mrs. Hayden.

Priscilla went on upstairs. There was no point in telling about a couple of nights hence, when she would have a date with Kenneth. Her mother would evidently be annoyed, had been annoyed by yesterday's picnic date. She wondered what her father thought. She must find out. That evening after dinner, she cornered her father and playfully took his newspaper away from him.

"Let's take a walk. Beautiful night."
From the light that leaped immediately into his tired eyes, Priscilla knew how much any small attention meant to her father. She knew also that she had been neglecting him. "Why, I'd like to," he said, "but I thought you'd be out with some young man this evening."
"Raymond isn't coming until half past eight. We have time."

As her father went after his hat, Priscilla heard Lorraine say something to James about "private conversation that we shouldn't hear, I suppose." Priscilla paid no attention and, in a moment, she and her father were walking down the street together.

"Well, what is it, daughter?" her father asked, drawing her arm through his. "I know there's something on your mind. Kenneth?"
Her father interrupted her. "Before we continue the discussion about Kenneth," he said, "in the funny, pedantic way he sometimes had—he taught history at the high school—tell me how you feel about Dennis now."

"Why... I don't know," she stammered, and then pride held its way with her. "I can do without Dennis," she said in an off-hand manner as she coughed. They walked in silence for awhile.

"Let's go in the drug store and have some ice cream," her father suggested. As they entered the brightly lighted place and sat down in a booth in the back of the store, Priscilla smiled at her father. He was such a darling! When she was a small girl, and something or somebody had hurt her, the panacea had been to go to the drug store and have some ice cream.

Mr. Hayden chatted of many things seemingly irrelevant, as they ate their ice cream. He mentioned the fact that, while she had been a great disappointment to him as a student of history, she was undeniably excellent in her English classes. He wanted her to do something with that ability. She must go to business school and learn stenography.

"So many young girls, who don't know a complete sentence from a complete idiot, go to business school," he told her humorously. "You'll be the exception. You will be the rare avis."
"Will I?" Priscilla had not thought she would ever be "in demand" as an office worker. The idea intrigued her. "Will I, really, Dad?"
"Definitely," he assured her. "You will be the rare avis."

It was not until they had almost reached their home that the question of Kenneth came up again. It was agreed between them that Priscilla would enter business school in the fall. She would take from September until the following June to complete her course.
