By SIDNEY B. CARTER

(Chapter 29)
Priscilla did not know how long she sat there on the narrow cot before Dennis came, but eventually she heard the barred door open and see. They key clicked in the lock and the matron's footstep went away. Priscilla looked up dazedly. It was Dennis.
The young lawyer put his briefcase on the floor and his arms around his girl. "Darling," he said, "I just came to tell you that Gertrude will be here this afternoon with the money for your bail. "But what... oh, Dennis, 25,000 dollars!" Priscilla could not believe it.
"I put a mortgage on the house," Dennis explained, "and then in answer to her look of concern: "Don't worry, dear, I'll get it back when the time comes."
Dennis kissed her, picked up a briefcase and left. Priscilla composed herself to wait for afternoon to come... and Gertrude was harder, she found, to wait in freedom when it was so close to all hopelessness, as she had done, knowing nothing, exciting nothing.
That afternoon, just as the sun began to filter timidly through the barred window, Priscilla was led to get her things together and go along. She had been bailed.
As she walked out of the door of the jail with Gertrude and into the ee spring air once more, Priscilla it exhilarated. For awhile, at least, she would not have to think the trial to come. A whole new freedom. Priscilla had never precal freedom before. She looked at the faces of people on the street. They seemed to take it as matter of course that they should be walking around in freedom as if they don't know how wonderful it is, she thought. They can't understand...

Dayton—Ninety-six descendants of the late Henry and Elizabeth Hewitt, gathered together for a reunion at the Dayton park. The Hewitts came to Oregon from Missouri in 1843 and settled in the Unionvale district.
To this union were born nine boys and one daughter. Dr. L. L. Hewitt, Dayton, is the only living son of this union.
