

DOUBLE TROUBLE

AP Newsfeatures By WILLIAM HOBSON

(Chapter 3)

Jay stripped off his shirt and hurriedly washed in a basin of cold water. He put on a clean shirt, cautiously opened the door, and peered into the hallway. It was empty, and Jay hurriedly went toward the back door.

He knew Joe. Joe liked to drink and if he'd been in Ashbury very long he'd be known in the saloons. He stroled over to a bar and the bartender grinned at the sight of him.

"Say, where you been keepin' yourself lately? Ain't seen you in a month of Sundays."

"Been down home," Jay said briefly. "Visiting the folks. How's things been going?"

"All right, I reckon. I saw Ellen on the street a little while ago with her ma and pa. You going back to ridin' for Randall?"

"So her name was Ellen Randall. Knowing her name helped a lot. Jay asked. "Quen' sake? A week overdues—Mike and the girl might get suspicious. He asked me to send that telegram to get you up here in a hurry. I sent it and you're here."

"In other words," Jay Allison said slowly, "I'm to take over his job and make love to his girl until he gets well enough to go back to stealing horses from his boss. The answer is that Joe can go to blazes. You tell him I said so. I never minded his wildness and drinking, but I'll have no part in any such mess."

"Sure thing," nodded Jay. It looked as though he were going to have a hard time filling in his brother's shoes until he got this mess straightened out. Joe was a hard drinker and Jay didn't care much for the stuff.

But he was tired from the long ride and the fiery liquor was welcome.

He crossed the street and made his way along the boardwalk to the open door of a small one-story building with two windows on the front wall, one on either side of the open door. Lettered on one were the words: James Swinnerton, Attorney-at-Law.

Jay went in. The place was deserted except for the man who sat back of the desk, going over some papers. He was in his thirties, blond and well built, and clean-shaven. The pencil dropped from his hand. He rose slowly. "Good heavens! It was all he said for the moment."

"It's impossible!" he said. "It just can't be! And yet I know it must be. You're Jay Allison, aren't you?"

Jay nodded, waiting. "Where's Joe?" he finally asked.

Swinnerton got up and closed the front door.

"I haven't got much time," Jay said impatiently. "I got in on the train just a little while ago. Took a room at the Ford and the next thing I know a red-haired girl grabbed me and started hugging me."

The lawyer laughed. "That's Ellen Randall. She and Joe are engaged to be married."

"I know that," granted Jay. "She told me that much. I'm supposed to go over and eat supper with them as soon as I finish bathing and shaving. So I haven't got much time. I want to know their names, what I'm supposed to do where Joe is and what's up. Where's Joe and where do you fit in?"

Swinnerton smiled, and leaned back in his chair. "Last week Joe got himself badly shot up. We've got him hid out."

"What's your part of the deal?" Jay shot back.

"My dear boy," the other laughed. "I'm Joe's lawyer. He got into a bit of trouble with a man named Peg Smith. Whatever it was, he tried to draw a gun on Joe, and Joe blocked the draw with one hand and said Peg's scalp open with a gun barrel. I defended him in court and got him off with a fine. Last week I never saw before came after me in the night. Joe wanted to see me. I found him hid out, but he'll live."

"How'd he get shot? He was supposed to be home the past month with the folks."

Swinnerton shrugged. "I can let
