There were big cottonwoods along Antelope Creek: cottonwoods with big spreading branches.
"Come on." Joe Allison chuckled to the others. "Mike'll hear thet its tail. Let's fog it up to the ranch."

They set out at a lope and the lane of poplars loomed up, and it became a race as the five horses pounded down the lane on the hard-packed earth, iron-shod hoofs ringing out. Doors flew open at the ranch house and the five swing down. Harry Selizer was the first to step forward, shaggy-haired, unshaven, dusty.

"You wild man!" cried out his mother, "You—you Texas cow-boy!"
"Ho, you men, come on inside," boomed out Randall's voice, "We've got a lot to talk over."

They left the horses and went through the door into the big dining room, now freshly scrubbed. Jay saw Mike's gaze going from one of them to the other, a frown of angry puzzlement and frustration beginning to form on his bushy brows. He went over to Ellen.
"You're looking well," was all he said.

"You're looking well," was all he said.
She said. "I'm glad you got back all right, Jay."
"I'm glad to get back. I want you to know and like Lucia. She's had a hard time of it."
"She's welcome in this home."
Ellen said softly.
"Which one of you," came Mike Randall's bull yoke above the hubbub of talk, "ia Joe?"
Joe wheeled to face him. "Me!" he said belligerently. "That's Jay over there. Why?"
Randall's face began to turn red. The red increased and then he let out a full-lumged roar. "You young whipper-snapper!" he bawled, and moved in toward him. "Double-cross me, did you? I ought to—"
"Now look here, you old—"

"Joe." she said again in that quiet voice.
He turned slowly and a sheeptish grin slid across his young face.
"What is it. honey?"
"There will be no more of that.
"All right," he said, and grabbed her. He gave her a resounding kiss and was pushed back firmly.
