Then did he mean to send her back with Martin? she wondered. He didn't. He dispatched Martin, tucked Arleta into his car, got in himself, but made no move toward starting the motor.

And then he said in a terse voice. "The ranch is out."

Of course she'd known it the moment she'd caught his first scrutining glance.

or course and known it the moment she'd caught his first scrut-inizing glance.

"All right." Her voice was a mere whisper, and then it began to swell with eagerness. "But tell me about it. Cal. Was it so bad, o completely run down, the house?"

The depot loomed out of the fog. Martin parked the car and announced he'd "so along in."

Martin appeared with luggage "Mister Calvin, he run onto some kinfolk," the chauffeur reported. "He ask can we take them home?"

The "kinfolk" (he was "something with the government") chatted with her. They'd heard so much about her; her newspaper photographs didn't do her justice. And while they chatted Arleits' mind ran in frantic circles. Cal had changed, But no, it was the presence of this couple imposing a restraint. He was looking at her in such a strange way. No, she was imagining things, how could she fathom his glance in this gloom?

And then the kinfolk were left at the Mayflower and the car was heading back to Virginia and Calvin was speaking to Martin.

"Martin, think you can find the club field in this fog? I left my car there." And to Arleta he said, "I want to drive back to the ship in the morning. Came down in an amergency field and I don't trust the service there."

She asked all of the proper quiestions. Had he had a nice trip? He hadn't. It was no time of the year for eross-country flying in a small ship. Oh, he'd made good enough time.

Then he had spent the full two weeks at the ranch, she though. "Couldn't you stop for dinner."
