(Chapter 7)
Arieta gave Howard a pitying glance. "It couldn't," she stated. "In the first place only fools and cowards vent their spleen on inanimate things. In the second, I know my father better than anyone knew him. He never explained. He said to explain was to pose an alibi and lower yourself to the level of sniveling."

"That's arrogance," protested Kelly. "Arieta shook her head. 'No, not in him it wasn't. He never did anything he knew wasn't right. To use his words—he smiled now—'first know you are right and to hell with the explanations.'"

Kelly, banking the fire, straightened up. "I'd better be on my way. Sure you don't want to spend the night at my place?"
She thanked him and asked him to thank his mother for her thoughtfulness, and she followed him down the narrow staircase to bolt the door after him. But when she returned to the nursery it was to return to loneliness.

When she awakened she wondered if it was another day. It certainly looked the same as the previous one, with clouds that sagged to spill their burden on an already sodden world, the steady downpour thumping on roof and window making her doubly grateful for the wood-burning stove that left behind.

From the thoughtfully packed larger bag she brought riding breeches and boots, sweater and a newly purchased leather jacket. She anticipated the cold but not the rain. Well, perhaps she'd find one of the old ponchos around the place.

A cup of coffee and she started out. Out of doors she found the same rain. At first she felt only fury; fury that anyone had dared destroy this beloved home her parents had built with such care. And then the fury chilled to cold anger and a purpose crystallized.

Turned back by undergrowth, she built up the nursery fire, took portfolio and fountain pen to the low table and wrote three letters.

The first was written to Mart Marlin.
"You said you wanted an opportunity to experiment with your pomicultural theories. I'll bargain. I haven't been up to the orchard but everything is ready to go now. However, if you and Tunia will come out and work for me we'll have a contract drawn up giving you the right to do as you please with the particular five acres. Living quarters and salary will be arranged."

"I'd like you to come at once. Mart will give you the key to my car. I'll give you everything you want in my name, with items on the enclosed list that I shall need. I am also enclosing a list of clothing to bring with you."

The second letter she wrote to Cal Sheridan.
"You understand I can't marry until I've cleared the Langtry name. I don't think that will be difficult. Knowing my father, I know he was too proud to bother."

The final letter was to her aunt and this was rewritten many times.
"It would have been kinder to let me know the truth, or as much of it as you knew."
And—"Please announce the wedding in my name. I shall be present. When Howard Kelly called from below she was ready. "If you're not ashamed to drive me as far as the bus in these togs," she remarked.

Kelly heaved a sigh of relief as she handed him her bags. She was actually preparing to leave.
He offered to take her to the nearest city, but she named a nearby resort town she knew would be open. "I need a general refitting," she explained reasonably. When he left her at a dry cleaning establishment, she thanked him appropriately and turned away with, "I really must hurry."
And then she waited until he was gone, turned her car back toward his home.

"Now," she turned to the proprietor, "where can I hire a car?"
An hour later she was driving back along the road she had traveled.

ed with Kelly. When they had discussed the somnolent resort cottages the previous day her mind had photographed one with a Ford Rent sign on it.
She made two more trips that day, one for a long-distance call to the city and an inspection of the cottage, then back for several hours of business contacts and the purchase of supplies.

That evening, found Arieta preparing her dinner in a tiny kitchenette with occasional trips to the large room where she tended fire. And when her dinner was over and the divan bed prepared, she sat down to a card table to check her day's work.

A crew of men to clean the house. Electricians to repair the pump, but first two men to clear the roadway of the big tree.

She awakened to the coldest weather she had ever experienced; even the sun trickling in through the pines was like lemon ice.
Where the previous morning mists had shrouded the view, there now lay a lake of sparkling blue, vivid against the green-topped red hills on the far side, the snow-covered range beyond.

This her father had had the vision to see, this beauty he had given to the people of this section. And to the plains below, irrigation, a controlled water supply in a country of summer drought.

And what had he received in return?
Arieta dug her heels into the terrace. She'd changed that. She'd force these people to honor his memory.
