"Yre Chips." sighed the man, "chip off the old block. Come on, Sam, lift your elbow; the kid's paid good cash. I'll take the big one. No sense shushi' the secon' generation for what th' first did. "The surly storekeeper Joined the man in stowing the boxes in Arleta's car. And then he left and Arleta, after fingering a tip, thought better of it. "I appreciate your help," she said softly. "Rheumy eyes glared at her. "Yeash?" he answered. "Well, you didn't have it comin'. Anything I do for a Langtry is pure grays." "Well—" Arleta caught the words her father would have used and drove off.

The Martins, having napped during her absence, were refreshed, eager for food and for talk. But this you ould talk. And so she was served before the fire in the big room, in the lone chair there, and then she had to remain sitting while they dined in the kitchen; and then she had to remain sitting while they stood respectfully before her with their reports.

It was Miss Leta who walked up to the one fully furnished room which was to be her own. The nursery quarters were closed off, left as they had been for some reason she hadn't yet devined.

There she found a low light, her bed furned down, gown, robe and slippers in place, and such clothing as the Martins had brought with them in order.

Sometime during the night the storm refreshed by its lull, came in to battle the big house, but Arleta slept through it, slept until her morning coffee.

"Miss Leta, the said, "Thin the big room of the lone of talk there is not have a development of the word of the man was like a threat where the big house, but Arleta slept through it, slept until her morning coffee.

"Miss Leta, there's two deer at the back door and Mart's beade himself. They attend with her morning coffee.

"Miss Leta, the said, the some him to battle the big house, but Arleta very distinct of his hand and they'd have come into the kitchen if I hadn't put my foot down."

For two days the storm held and it was a period of blassful peace.

"Site very the way and and an except the kitchen if I hadn't put my loot down."

For two days the atorm held and it was a period of bliasful peace. Arieta read her mail and answered it and Tunia was spicily busy in the kitchen.

The third day, red sunset fires burned on the horizon, and that night the light on the peninsula was joined by a galaxy of stars repeating themselves in the lake below.

Arleta hurried to the stairs, but Martin had reached the door before she was halfway down. And she laughed to see How Keily's mouth literally freeze on a fresh "Chips" as he confronted the grave dignity of Martin.

"You wished to see—?" offered Martin.

"You wished to see—?" offered Martin.

But Kelly was seeing; seeing a slim figure in cherry red flannel, curls piled high, coming down the stairway, and he was trying to find in that figure the rumpled Chips of boots and breeches.

"This is Mr. Kelly, Martin," she called, "Do bring him in to the fire. And can you find another chair, and something hot?"

He met her at the foot of the stairs. "To the rescue again?" she naked!

When I saw the light over here

"When I saw the light over here I had visions of you starving to death, and them," he smiled at her, "I heard you'd shopped for an army, But that was Chips was shopped." Arleits nodded and frowned. "I know, I feel like a split personality myself. Or a chameleon," she sided. "I'm back to dressing for church bazaars, bridge prizes, somballed." Martin brought in a kitchen chair and literally served it to Mr. Kelly, and Tunia followed with hot coffee and splee cake, and then the Martins, with chains on their tires and a pencilled road map, departed for the recort town for supplies. And Arleita told How Kelly about the Martins.

He left soon after that, turning back to call, "Tell Mart I've a pretty good library; he might like to borrow some books while he's snowed in."

The three were reading that certain afternoon. Mart, looking up, found the rooms were chilly.
