Chapter 14

The kettle dripped, thinking as vaguely as Cal Sheridan's credulity. "But, Letta," he protested at length. "The lanes are . . . 'Quality!' she asked bitterly. "Cal, why didn't you mention Alene Lane to me when you returned?"

"Mention her?" He turned puzzled eyes on her. "Why, Letta, I hardly saw you. I mean, we were together such a short time after I returned."

"And whose fault was that?"

"Letta, your voice doesn't sound like you. Look, dear, Martin came back with the car; let's run in town for dinner. I'll drive over to my plane."

"At the lanes?"

"Their field wasn't cleared. Troop and dress, dear."

"Dress?" Arieta's laugh was sharp, but she quickly caught herself. "You can drop me at a dress shop while you go to the plane. I brought only boots and breeches."

Arieta remembered vaguely the location of the shop her mother had patronized, and after a few false attempts they found it.

She dashed in and then out. "They'll hold it open, so pick me up here."

"The saleswoman remembered her mother. She also remembered Arieta. 'My dear,' she said, 'you wouldn't have recognized you. You were such a square child, and the way you set your heels. Now, would you like something your mother would have chosen for you?'"

"Yes," Arieta spoke hastily. "I would."

"Her taste," the silver-haired saleswoman announced, "was impeccable."

The gray was the gray of a pigeon's wing, soft, melting. The skirt flared, the jacket fitted Arieta as though it had been designed for her. It buttoned to the collar with tiny silver buttons.

Calvin Sheridan, seated at the wheel of Arieta's car, saw the light of the shop's doorway come on, saw Arieta step out, "like a picture out of a frame," he thought with pride.

Arieta whirled in the doorway and the skirt swirled above her button-shoed ankles. "Like it?" she asked Calvin gaily.

"Patrician, Letta," she said, "patrician in every line."

Settled in the car, her gray fur coat covering her "patricianess," Arieta asked, "Do you know of a decent place?"

"Sapphire Room," Sheridan remarked absent-mindedly.

She might have known.

"Remind me to show you the newspaper picture of you and that Miss Lane at the Sapphire Room."

"What?" The car nearly locked bumper with the one ahead. "What photograph? Oh, but there were several . . . what do you mean?"

"Ho-ho-ho," he chuckled. "A neighbor inadvertently gave it to me. Of course your face was a bit oily with chicken grease and—"

"Chicken grease? We didn't have chicken."

"It must have been something delectable to have kept you over an extra week," Arieta said.

"Extra? Oh, that. Didn't I tell you I'd dropped a vital part of my engine? Queerest thing, though, I could have sworn it was all right when I came in on the Lane field, but—"

Arieta heard nothing more. So it had been plane's part that had held him? And Alene Lane flew? And Cal's plane had been on her private field? So Andy Kelly had said Alene was so busy "staking a claim" to Sheridan she hadn't had time to think of one Chips Langtry.

The Sapphire Room. "It's exquisite," she said, as they stood on the threshold and looked down a narrow row, with a cocktail bar on one side, the other lined with lighted, mirror-backed glass cases upon the glass shelves of which was the most beautiful collection of blue glass she had ever seen. "Meastair Sheridan." A sapphire blue figure bowed.

Calvin had telephoned for a reservation. They were conducted to the table and Arieta was amazed to hear the calls of greeting which flanked their progress. She'd thought she was the native of that country. But no one spoke to her. No one knew her.

Calvin ordered, and then he spoke. "The usual," murmured Arieta, and was brought, much to the disgust of the bartender, sauteuse with charged water.

Arieta sipped the sparkling drink, unaware of anyone around her until a husky voice used her name. "Strutting her stuff, as usual. She was, if you please, so help me, Arieta Langtry. So this old beer boy, seeing she simply couldn't carry her order to the car, says he'll carry it."

Cal Sheridan seemed frozen to waiting stillness and Arieta noted the display of a sapphire world, preferring old-fashioned mirrors which could reveal the features of those farther away.

"I've finished. Have you?" Arieta's voice was urgent.

"Quite," stated Sheridan.

"But they hadn't. As they entered the round blue room they felt a vibration behind them, a vibration like the swirl of a whirlpool.

Involuntarily they looked back, and out of the vortex of that whirlpool came a vision in bright-red flame red.

"Cal," it cried. "Why, Cal, you did come back. And after you wouldn't?"

"Quite," stated Sheridan.

"You've met Miss Langtry, Miss Lane?"

"Miss Langtry?" The vision in red seemed sunk in deep thought. And then black curls were tossed back. "Oh, yes. You mean Chips. The girl who could outwear the toughest lumberjack Big Chips could ship in."
