Chapter 15

Arieta found the toes of her shoes spreading. Willfully she brought them together. She wasn't Chips, Little Chips, chip off the old block. She was Miss Arieta Langtry.

"Leta—" came Cal Sheridan's voice, asking something. "Charmed I'm sure," she said, looking straight into the eyes of Allene Lane. "But why should I educate a girl who can think of more blasphemous reports than any lumberjack Big Chips ever imported?"

There, the blue-liveried attendant had pulled back her chair, slid it under her, pushed her to the table as though it were a rock to which she should cling.

Sheridan sat opposite her, studying her, and suddenly the handsome lines of his face broke into merriment. "So," he said, "you're Chips. Chips isn't a cousin. You're the girl who—"

"I do enjoy a seafood cocktail when the sauce has that certain piquancy, don't you, Cal?" she asked.

"In-dubitably," he spaced the syllables. "Fact, I enjoy piquancy in any form. How, by the way, did you know of Miss Lane's... er, adjectives?"

She'd thought it a shot in the dark. On second thought, she realized she should thank How Kelly. They had finished their first course when they heard a subdued chatter and six couples came in from the cocktail bar. Arieta saw a flash of red, saw Cal rise and again heard the voice of Allene Lane. "Now that we've met," she drawled, "why not get acquainted? We're neighbors, you know. Move over to our table."

Arieta waited for Calvin to answer. He did, and her breath came out in a soft whisper of relief. "Please," he said, "allow me to have this evening with Miss Langtry. We've so much to discuss. I have to fly back tomorrow."

"You won't fly tomorrow," Miss Lane prophesied.

Her escort came up, was introduced to Arieta and observed, "What do you know about it, Arieta? You're grounded."

They finished before the Lane party was served its entree, but Allene had to have the final word. "Do call, Miss Langtry," she begged with exaggerated sweetness. "Mother would adore meeting any child of Big Chips Langtry."

"You are kind," murmured Arieta, and was torn between a desire to fight and a desire to flee.

"Miss Lane," sighed Sheridan, as he helped Arieta into her car, "must have spent too much time at the bar. She wasn't like this when I was here before."

Nothing could have been more cheerless than the next morning—rain lashing the windows, waves ruffling the lake, trees whipping about in the wind helplessly. "Allene called it," Cal said, as Martin closed the big door behind him. "Whew, what a day!"

The breakfast room was cheerful, with the new gaily painted table set with the runners of Chinese red, the bright yellow pottery, and the artistic arrangement of fruit in a copper platter. Tunia had retrieved from a scrop heap all a vivid contrast to the storm-lashed world beyond the windows.

"Leta, I like this," Cal said with enthusiasm. "I do wonder you kept harping on home. I thought it would be like the Lane place, town-house-in-the-country stuff. Not that they haven't a beautiful home, but this is different. It belongs to its background."

Arieta felt new joy surge up. If Cal felt that way she could have both her home and him. And she felt as though she were already married, for she asked none of the questions so close to her lips.

They remained in the breakfast room after the table was cleared and Sheridan talked.

"There's just one solution," decided Cal briskly. "We'll go on with our plans, and after we're married, we'll come out here for a couple of months each year. I'll handle—"

"I'm sorry, Cal." She moved away from him. "I can't marry you until—she looked out of the window to where the dam lake covered
