Chapter 16

Arieta rented a trailer and returned with occupants for the stay. Madam X, a cheater, with a background like her name, and a sedate matronly creature who answered to the name of Silver Bess for Martin.

They rode home in the sunset. Martin's eyes excited as they surveyed the old orchard, Arieta's completely content. And Tunia met them beyond the house, her eyes bulging out.

"Miss Letta, you'd never guess. But there she was. How Kelly brought her."

"How Kelly," echoed Arieta. "And she chose the southwest room because of the sun. She said she congealed the moment she left Virginia. And, Miss Letta, she's had three pots of tea."

"Tunia," Arieta slid from Madam X, handing the reins to Martin, "who had three—"

"Your mother's Aunt Betsy Anne," mourned Tunia.

"Aunt Betsy Anne? Oh my!" began Chups—"word," offered Arieta quickly. "But how—why—"

"She brought a letter from Mrs. Ainslee. I'll get it."

Arieta read the letter, standing before the living room fire. She'd braided her hair. The two pigtailed stood out just as her two booted feet spread out, and Tunia, remembering Miss Langry of Virginia, after one horrified look retreated to the kitchen.

"He's also postmaster," murmured Arieta.

Frowning, she read: INVEST CAUSMODITH MERITPRO BILL SYKES LEAVE SUBITO

"Code?" inquired Mrs. Worthington brightly.

"Code," echoed Arieta faintly. "Good night, Aunt Betsy; Arine's so glad you're here."

But when the door had closed behind the portly woman she read again, translating aloud. "Investigation caused Mother's death. Investigation—Big Chups' middle name—proven robber. Leave immediately."

And then, "Impossible for you to remain alone while receiving Calvin and other guests, and dear Betsy Anne did so need a change of scenery."

And—Calvin agrees. He says there is a very handsome person living nearby. I think he said a Bohemian, and of course the Bohemians are especially—"

How Kelly, artist and writer, how Kelly who had tried everything short of murder to be rid of her. A Bohemian with a small "b" why—it was Chups who grinned—Calvin was jealous of Kelly.

She might as well deal with Betsy Anne immediately. Arieta look the steps two at a time as a young Chups had once done, arriving at the door of the southwest guest room rosy-cheeked and fairly vibrating with energy.

Mrs. Worthington took one look, frowned and hurried her niece in her pillow. "Little girl, tell my niece I heard her come in. I must speak to her at once." And when the little girl didn't answer she looked up. "Arieta," she cried, "what are you doing in that outlandish outfit? And your hair—"

"Saves being decapitated when one rides through the brush," Arieta offered defensively.

"Decapitated?" moaned her aunt. "That's what the man said, that awful man, Indians. He said the woods were full of them."

Arieta nodded solemnly. "They are," she agreed. "What else did the man say?"

Mrs. Worthington sat up. "He had the audacity to ask if I'd come out to help persuade you to return East."

With quickened interest came Arieta's next question. "How did Mr. Kelly happen to find you and where?"

"At the depot, where else? Letta didn't realize I couldn't take a cab from the depot until Calvin told her; then Calvin, realizing this person and hired him to meet me. He'd have brought you, but you were goose hunting."

"Goose hunting?" cried Arieta indignantly, wondering if How Kelly had used such an excuse to talk to her aunt alone. Then—"Oh, my goodness," she moaned, "you mean a wild goose chase. Aunt Betsy Anne, Mr. Kelly isn't in the taxi business; he's a writer and an artist."

"Humm!" burst from her aunt, and she swung her ponderous frame out of bed. "My slippers, like a good girl. So he's the Bohemian. I don't wonder Calvin's worried. If were a younger woman—Well, Arieta, aren't you going to dress for dinner?"

Arieta looked down at her completely content. And Tunia met them beyond the house, her eyes bulging out.

"Miss Letta, you'd never guess. But there she was. How Kelly brought her."

"How Kelly," echoed Arieta. "And she chose the southwest room because of the sun. She said she congealed the moment she left Virginia. And, Miss Letta, she's had three pots of tea."

Room and Board

By Gene Ahern

Hi, Judge! How you like my snazzy new set of threads? The whole riggin' from shoe to shingle tilted me for $110!—Hah!—wouldn't this layout break up a log jam!

Awk!—The clerk who sold that carnival outfit got a bonus!

Ahh!—Quite sharp, Alf!—But wear your lumberjack clothes for press photos—good promotion stuff, y'know!
