in." yoo-hoo, Lucy, dearie, do come in." yoo-hoo, Lucy, dearie, do come in." Arleta wondered if the startled look in the girl's gray eyes conveyed surprise or annoyance. Dutfully she entered the crowded little parlor and dutifully accepted an introduction to Miss Langtry. "But I must go on."

She didn't. She couldn't. Short of pulling her in and locking the door behind her, Mrs. Cotsen stopped at nothing. "I must hear about your party. You did have a wonderful time, and gifts?"

The girl's eyes blazed. "I don't know which surprised ts more the party or the gifts. Dart took the gifts into the Salvation Army this morning. One cannot dispose of uninvited guests in such a convenient manner."

"Dear child—" Mrs. Cotsen literally dove for the coffee pot, tossing her words back.—"they were only being neighborly. Young couple getting started."

"As I was saying to Arleta"—Mrs. Cotsen broke a ring of sugary clinnamon rolls—"it just don't seem nach-rel to see her 'thout those dogs of hers."

"Oh!" Arleta forgot the angry Listy. "Would you now your words and the seem anch-rel to see her 'thout those dogs of hers."

"Oh!" Arleta forgot the angry Listy. "Would you know word."

Chapter 17

Arieta turned to the window Now, looking down on the lake, she asw a red gold glare. It was like a torch, the torch her mother hace a torch, the torch her mother hace a torch, the torch her mother hace won't tell me."

"If I only knew where to start, she thought frantically. "Arline won't tell me."

Who would? Where had she learned the little she had learned? That basket, the newspaper with the photographs. How Kelly had blurted, "Subile." And it had been Mrs. Costen who had called her father's death murder.

Mrs. Costen who had called her father's death murder.

Mrs. Costen who had called her father's death murder.

Mrs. Costen would know. And Arleta believed she could induce ther to cell.

When Arleta pulled up on the sliff above the Coter cottage she found blue smoke raing to lose itself in blue clouds.

And even as she looked a door opened and a white aprion was waved at her. "Come in, dearie called Mrs. Cotsen. "Twe just put the coffee pot on."

"Wait," She padded to the door to stand listening. "That's Rolla coming home from market. Always honks at the turns; had an accident once. I would ask her in but we don't see eye to eye. Not that she's wild. I mean the parties she gives are nice but noisy.

Rilla was passing a car. both had stopped to talk, and Mrs. Cotsen had to strain her cars. "Annie Brown that was, Father lan off with that barmaid. Folks alid he met her counding up Andle, not that I believed it, Annies a nice girl, pretty, too."

Arleta moved restlessly. If Mrs. Cotsen would only get through with the neighbors. But now a fresh subject had appeared. "Lucy, see, cutting across the lower lot? Oh but you wouldn't remember. I mean ashe's new. Lovely girl, Lucy, and her husband Dart's poor as Job's turkey and as proud. I wow they'd go hungry before they'd whey'd go hungry before they dook in the girl's gray eyes conveyed surprise or annoyance.
