(Chapter 19)
Pencil and paper — if she could write down what she was thinking. Her old desk contained crayons. She opened the desk. Something fell out. She picked it up and laughed. Drawing wasn't her strong point. This she remembered, was supposed to have been a horse. It looked like a beetle.

There was fresh paper. A pad. And on it scribbled:
"Little Chips—" And then doodling crosses, eggs, squares. Fool. And after her sharp lines—Little Chips—mind like mine. Understand. Idiots... why don't they file? Wrong advice. Wonder. Who's behind this?"

Arletta looked into the gathering twilight. "Daddy, you wrote something again?" she asked. "What is it? What among all of these lines?"

And then into the quietness came a rap on the door and Tania's voice. "Miss Letta, Mr. Kelly is here. He's very anxious to talk to you."

Arletta put the notebook into her jacket pocket and without giving thought to her appearance went down to find how Kelly standing before the hearth fire, a look of grim exasperation upon his face.

"So you're at it again," he barked. "At what again?" she asked. "Stirring up a hornet's nest. You talk on a poor, defenseless old woman and call her evil. You leave her in such a condition her friends have to call a physician to quiet her."

He scowled down at her a moment, then laughed. "I've always wanted to catch one of these snobs in the making. Come on."

They drove past the Cotesen place drove up a second hill to come out on a turn-in carved out of the side of the hill.

"Annie," Kelly barked at the dark-eyed girl who opened the door. "Who's been in to the Cotesen place today?"

"After Miss Langtry flew out, so on but the doctor and Miss Lane."

"Ah," Kelly's voice came out in a whisper. "Which came first?"

"Miss Lane. She rode in. She went out the back door as the doctor drove up."

"Well, thanks for the information. Come on, Chips."

But when they had driven up before the Cotesen place Arletta was ordered to remain in the car.

How Kelly came out with an abrupt, "Come on, Mrs. Cotesen wants to apologize."

"Up went Arletta's chin. "Even an apology from her would be a insult," she stated.

"Meaning," said Kelly thoughtfully, "you don't give anyone a chance to explain. Okay." And he went around to his side of the car.

"I just had a thought," said Kelly as the car plunged down the hazy road.

The destination proved to be a long, low adobe building huddling in the mud, a blue electric sign proclaiming Mexican dishes a specialty.

"We won't be interrupted here," Kelly announced, as Arletta sank into a deep plum-colored chair.

"That's more than I could promise at my place. Now, tell me that you learned today."

The demand was so unexpected Arletta responded.

"That my father promised the people of this valley ten acres of irrigated land for every acre of ralley land they gave up to the lake," she began.

Kelly nodded.

"But they believe he reneged, and when they came to claim the land a farm combine had bought up all of the choice acres and they were forced to accept gravel land or dirt without."

"Right again."

"But I don't believe it!" stated Arletta.

"Why?"

"In the first place these people brought suit. Had their claims been legal the courts would have—"

"The courts," interrupted Kelly, "could do nothing but what they did, refuse to honor the suits. Chips Langtry knew law. He placed a limitation date on the filing of the suit. I know. He was to receive six hundred acres for his sixty. The agreement he signed contained this clause: 'claim to the six hundred to be made within ninety days of the signing of this agreement.' That was agreeable, but when Father went down to establish his claim the Langtry Land Company said the surveyors were not through; he'd have to wait until boundaries were set."

"Again, hearing the suit had been thrown out, he went down. This time, Kelly paused impressively. "He found every acre of rich ground already claimed. No law had been violated, not in fact, but a moral law had been so broken it broke a hundred families right along with it."

He waited a moment, then added, "That's what Big Chips Langtry did to his friends and neighbors."
