"The United States, in order to offer constructive leadership in the United Nations, must take the initiative with positive action on the drafting of a human rights covenant, since the observance of human rights is one of the basic issues dividing the world," Miss Katherine V. Lyford, of Boston, Mass., emphasized in a recent informal statement submitted to the department of state. Copies of the statement have come to the Salem Business and Professional Women's club.

Miss Lyford, who is national chairman of international relations for the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc., stated that the opinions she forwarded were based on information received from both national and local leaders of the organization she represents. Her statement will be considered, as will statements from other organizations and leaders, when the state department frames its report of the United States' position for the next session of the commission on human rights, which will be held at Lake Success late in March.

Miss Lyford's complete informal statement contained eight drafts with reference to the draft covenant. Among the eight was a stipulation that: "The first covenant on human rights should contain articles on only civic and political rights. Social and economic rights should be considered at a later date."

Point 8 of the statement read: "All statements of our delegation should be based on the recognition of the need for extending to women, all rights considered subject for inclusion in the covenant."

HOW HE PLANS BEYOND TOMORROW

The story of one of the nation's oldest benefit plans

1. When illness comes...or if he should have an accident...a telephone man counts on the company benefit plan to help tide him over until he can work again. Now 37 years old, the plan is paid for entirely by the company and keeps the paycheck coming, when it's needed most, to men and women of two or more years' service. There are death benefits for dependents, too.

2. When an employee retires, a solid pension will add to his own savings—of course, no security plan eliminates the need to save. But, for example, if he started at 22 and retires when he's 62, following ten years with an average wage of $80 a week, he'll get a pension of $139 a month. Buying these benefits on his own would have meant putting aside large additional sums for insurance or savings.

3. This is not an employment message...we have all the people we need almost everywhere. But it does show one important reason why we can keep the company efficient and vigorous by attracting and holding the capable people needed to furnish good service to you...the people who have played a great part in making your telephone more and more valuable.
