Gemini, Classical Twins, Can Be Seen in Sky This Winter

By J. HUGH PRUETT

Astronomer, Extension Division, Oregon Higher Education System
In the long ago, so we are sometimes told, there lived twin brothers whose mighty deeds become so famous that at last they were changed into bright stars and placed side by side in the blue

After ages of time they are still there, and can easily be seen tonight and during the next few months whenever the sky is clear.

Around 7 p.m., face almost due east and look quite high in the sky. There they are, two prominent stars, fairly close together and one almost above the other. The upper one, the whiter in color, is Castor. His brother Pollux is slightly brighter and to normal eyes is decidedly orange. This indicates a lower temperature than that of Castor. Both are exceedingly far from the acceptance of the sky is clear.

Good telescopes break Castor the winter mountain sport with one of the favorite winter sea-shoulde. At a considerable distance from the double there is a fainter star which seems to belong to the same system. The spectroscope indicates that every one of the three is also a double, but too close to be separated visually by any telescope.

Whenever the light profanity of "by Jiminy" escapes your lost of the favorite winter sea-shoulded and lost quite for the favorite winter sea-shoulded and lost quite from the double. The twins, or Gemini, really constitute a considerable group of stars, with Castor and Pollux marking only the faces of the at this time of year, they are reclining with their feet toward the south. It is easy to trace reclining with their feet toward the south. It is easy to trace their outlines. Starting with Castor, we find an irregular line of fainter stars extending thoward the right and finally curving gently upward into the foot of this brother. Then tracing in the same direction from Pollury we find a similar line all-foot shaft. Pollux we find a similar line al- foot shaft.

James White, pioneer who laid out the city of West Salem, now part of Salem, was honored Tuesday night when the city planning and zoning commis-sion recommended that a street be named in his memory.

The name is a change from Lincoln avenue, which conflicts with Lincoln street in Salem. White street is in the old White donation land claim. It extends three blocks north from Edgewater and a block west of
