Big Smelt School Hovers Off Mouth With Boston Sox Of Columbia River

Woodland, Wash., March 16 @P.—Washington state fisheries inspector Frank Swick said here today that a big school of smelt was hovering in the Columbia river five miles north of here, just off Martin's bluff.

Swick said dipnetters were getting only a few smelt from the Columbia river. None of the fish have entered any tributaries yet, but they were within a few hours time from the mouth of the Lewis river. River fishermen lingering smelt probably will not get into the Sandy river in Oregon for another week because of their slow move-

Federal Service Says Storms Took Heavy Seal Toll

Washington, March 16 (U.P.) — The U. S. fish and wildlife ser-vice reported today that winter storms have taken a heavy toll of the fur-bearing seals of the Pacific.

Hundreds of fur seal pups aged one year or less have been found dead on the Oregon and Washington coasts. The service believes hundreds more were never found.

The seals evidently were killed during January's heavy storms and low temperatures along the Pacific northwes coasts, agency biologists said. In normal years, seldom ar more than a dozen or two killed
